possible for him to form an opinion as to whether the file has been made by some better or worse process; in other words, that files differ from one another as regards their efficiency for the purposes for which they are bought?—That is the experience of mechanics who use the files; and no doubt evidence may be forthcoming to that effect from practical workmen.

27. Can a hand-cut file be distinguished from a machine-cut file by an expert?—If you mean by an expert a person who has been trained to the practice of file cutting, then the probabilities are that the difference would be detected; but in some cases it would be difficult to discern between the two on the appearance of the article. There are even processes of this kind where the variation in the waving of the tooth, or the rowing, is imitated by the machine. I will just give an illustration of what I mean by the rowing of the file (producing a file and explaining it to the Committee).

28. It is where the points of intersection of the lines come and form rows as I understand?—Yes.

29. In the case of a hand-cut file, do those rows go less straight or more straight than in the case of a machine-cut file?—As a rule less straight.

30. That is the first point of distinction between the two?—That is so, and that is imitated in some cases by the machine working a little irregularly.

31. Are machines made specially for the purpose of making those rows irregular?—They accomplish that object in some cases.

Mr. Jacks.

32. Is it intentional?—We have evidence that it was intended.

Mr. Stuart-Wortley.

33. Your belief is that it was intended?—Yes.

34. You have told us that hand-cut and machine-cut files can be distinguished from one another by those engaged in the manufacture of them, by expert file cutters?—Yes.

35. Is it equally easy for a distinction to be discerned by those who are merely consumers or users of the file?—No, it cannot.

Chairman.

36. I understand you to say it is most difficult for anybody to detect the difference?—Yes, it is most difficult for any ordinary person. An expert file cutter may be able to distinguish in the majority of cases; but there are cases where it is possible in some classes of files to deceive even an expert file cutter.

Mr. Stuart-Wortley.

37. Has this difficulty of detecting the distinction in practice encouraged frauds in the manufacture of these files?—Yes. The fact that it is difficult to detect as to whether a file is hand-cut or machine-cut has caused very serious difficulty. I can give evidence of cases where persons have purchased over the counter from manufacturers files, asking to be supplied with hand-cut files, and have been supplied with machine-cut files. They could not ascertain the difference until they were submitted to an expert or were submitted to certain tests; it is in the working where they were found out. I have a case of that which perhaps I may refer to.

38. I propose to take you generally through some of your cases with a view of showing that mistakes are possible. Was there not a case (it is the first case that is mentioned in the evidence you have supplied to me) in which files which proved ultimately to be machine-cut were sold openly in other towns as hand-cut, the mark on the file being given as the guarantee?—That is so.

39. We will identify that case in this way: did that case consist of a consignment purchased in Liverpool of 39 parcels containing 220 files, 14-inch and 16-inch; is that correct?—Yes.

40. Which was stamped "hand-cut"?—Yes, and there were 18-inch files, too.

41. To put it shortly, did that case result in a prosecution by the Board of Trade and a conviction under the Merchandise Marks Act?—It did.

Mr. Albert Bright.

42. Were they stopped by the Board of Trade in Liverpool?—They were consigned to a Liverpool dealer in files as hand-cut files, and the Liverpool person where the files were seized under warrant swore in evidence when the case came on that he had no knowledge whatever but what they were as he had ordered, the best hand-cut files.

Mr. Stuart-Wortley.

43. He had ordered hand-cut files?—Yes, hand-cut files; and they were hand-cut files to the best of his knowledge and belief, for which he had paid the usual price, and it could only be detected by experts. This is one of the files (producing a file).

Mr. Hazell.

44. Were they stamped "hand-cut"?—Yes, they were. The point in that case was this: Although it was certainly an infringement of the Merchandise Marks Act, it was only at very great cost and difficulty that this was detected; and further, the marking of them in that way strengthened the belief on the part of the person who purchased the goods and sold them that he was dealing in a perfectly legitimate manner, which, of course, was quite contrary to what was proved to be the fact. That was the position. Moreover, a penalty of 20*l.* and costs was imposed. Of course, that was only a nominal penalty. After the mark was obliterated, the files were returned back again, so that practically so large a trade, we believe, is being done in this class of goods that people can afford to risk detection in consequence of the comparatively small penalties which are attached when they are detected.

Mr. Stuart-Wortley.

45. In this case, if there had been no mark upon the file, there would have been no ground for any prosecution at all, would there?—Certainly not.

Mr. Stuart-Wortley—continued.

46. There would have been no infringement of the law?—No, except that the retailer himself had stated to the consumer that they were what they really were not; and then it would have been a most difficult thing to carry through a prosecution, in consequence of the difference of opinion as to whether the Merchandise Marks Act in its present form can be fully established upon a mere verbal statement.

47. That file which you have produced is one of the very files in question?—Yes; they were purchased and sold over the counter as hand-cut.

48. Was there another case in Sheffield in 1882. I am not anxious, and I understand you are not anxious, to mention names?—I have no desire to do so.

49. Was there a case in 1892 in which the examiners for the Admiralty themselves were mistaken as to the mode of manufacture of some files?—That is so; a very large quantity of files were supplied to the Government.

50. Nearly 3,000 dozen, I believe?—Yes. One of the other witnesses, I believe, can speak to that more particularly if required.

Mr. Albert Bright.

51. Is this file which you have produced completely machine-cut?—Yes.

52. Is not that side (pointing to the file) hand-cut?—No.

53. Not the edge?—No; it is entirely machine-cut.

54. Could that be proved without any doubt at all?—Yes, it was proved in court.

Mr. Stuart-Wortley.

55. In that case did the defendants contest the fact that it was machine-cut?—They did not eventually.

56. Did they at first?—Before the case came on there was a good deal of talk about it.

57. But, in the end, the court did not have to decide between the evidence of an expert, on the one hand, who said they were machine-cut, and the evidence of other persons, on the other hand, who said they were not?—I may state that Mr. Herbert Hughes, the secretary to the Chamber of Commerce, was the prosecuting solicitor in this case, and he knows all about the case. There was no defence practically to it in the end.

58. The fact that they were machine-cut was not seriously contested before the magistrates?—No.

Mr. Charles Shaw.

59. In the case of the 3,000 dozen files, was it stipulated in the Government order that they should be hand-cut?—Yes.

60. It was not merely a general understanding; the words "hand-cut" were on the order, were they?—The words "hand-cut" were on the order.

61. I ask the question because I know many orders are sent in general terms, in which it is understood by the merchant and the customer that the files shall be hand-cut, although it is not stipulated?—It was the contract that they were to be hand-cut in that case.

62. It was on the order?—Yes.

Mr. Stuart-Wortley.

63. Were the deliveries examined by the Admiralty for the purpose of seeing whether they were hand-cut or machine-cut?—I assume that; I could not say whether they were examined or not; at all events, they never detected it.

64. Then was there a case of files sold over the counter for hand-cut which turned out to be machine-cut?—Yes.

65. I think you have brought the correspondence and the actual files in that case?—Yes, I have samples here if honourable Members wish to see them.

66. We will call that case No. 3?—Yes. These are samples of files which were sold over the counter as hand-cut (producing some files).

Mr. Jacks.

67. Where were they sold?—In Sheffield. The names are covered over, but I can give the names in confidence, if it is desired.

Mr. Stuart-Wortley.

68. Are there any marks as to the mode of manufacture on them?—No.

69. They are unmarked files, except with the name of the manufacturer?—Yes.

Mr. Jacks.

70. What has been taken out here (pointing to one of the files)?—I think they have taken the name out for some reason.

Mr. Charles Shaw.

71. Those were sold as hand-cut, but not marked as hand-cut, I understand?—No, it was a verbal statement that they were hand-cut; and they all eventually turned out to be machine-cut, with the exception of this little finishing off at the corner (pointing to the file), and just a little hopping.

72. That was done by hand?—Yes, that much; but it was not a pennyworth of work.

Mr. Stuart-Wortley.

73. Now, take case No. 4; were large quantities of files being sold in the Midlands as hand-cut?—Yes, there were.

74. Was there ground for believing that they were really machine-cut?—Yes.

75. Were you approached to give your opinion as an expert upon samples submitted to you?—I was. I was waited upon by first of all a clerk in connection with the firm who brought to me a certain correspondence which had passed, and requested to know if I would give an expert opinion if samples of the files were submitted to me. I stated that I would, and that I would also give, if they desired it, a written statement, so that there should be no mistake about it. They obtained two half dozen of files and submitted them to me.

76. What class of files were they, and of what sizes?—Flat bastard 14-inch files. I found in each each parcel there were five files entirely machine-cut, and one hand-cut; that in one of the parcels the hand-cut was what we call a dummy, that is, if you sound it it does not ring, it is cracked somewhere probably; it is an imperfect file. In the other parcel was one soft, that is, imperfectly hardened, or of steel of such a character that it would not harden. Both the hand-cut files, therefore, were files which certainly ought not to have gone out to any consumer. After I had examined them, I gave a written statement as to what they were, and the understanding was that the firm felt themselves so very much aggrieved with the action that was being taken by the people who were cutting them in the market, that if arrangements were made for a prosecution they would give me the evidence. I may say they stated to me (although I did not see the labels) that each parcel was labelled "hand-cut." There were no names of the maker upon the files. They were marked "warranted cast steel," to give the purchasers an idea that they were buying a good article; but there was no name of the maker; so that there was the greatest difficulty, in fact it was absolutely impossible for me, except upon seeing the label, to have any knowledge as to who the parties were whom they were dealing with in regard to these files; consequently I was entirely at the mercy of the person who submitted to me the goods, so far as prosecution was concerned.

77. Was the information given to you that these files were put upon the market as hand-cut?—Yes, they were put upon the market and largely sold.

78. No prosecution resulted in that case, I believe?—No, it did not. I was at the trouble of ascertaining from the Board of Trade whether they were prepared to take up the case. It was stated they would be, in case I got up the evidence; but when I got back, the firm told me that the parties had been to them and arranged the matter, so that they had decided not to go into it. There were some family reasons, which would of course render it a very difficult thing.

79. Was that in August 1893?—It was. I have copies of the letters here, and honourable Members can see them if it is desired.

80. Now we come to case No. 5. Have you in your hands, for the purposes of this inquiry, the letters and samples of files in the case of a large order for hand-cut files in which machine-cut were supplied instead of hand-cut?—Yes. I may say that this correspondence, with samples of the files, has been placed in my hands for the purposes of the Committee (producing a parcel). The marks are covered up. For obvious reasons it is undesirable that the names should be given; but I am prepared to place the matter in the hands of the Chairman of this Committee, who will deal according to his own judgment with the case. This is a most glaring case.

Chairman.

81. I am afraid I cannot do anything but what the Committee may do?—I will hand them in (handing in the documents and the sample).

Mr. Stuart-Wortley.

82. Having read that correspondence and examined those samples, have you any doubt that those files were put on the market as hand-cut, and were in fact machine-cut?—I have not the slightest doubt; I may say I am personally unaware of the name of the manufacturer; but I am informed it is on the file.

Chairman.

83. You produce samples that were put on the market as hand-cut which in your judgment are machine-cut: is that what you say?—Yes; in the view of the expert who examined them. I may explain that this was a portion of a large order sent abroad. I was informed that the order was given for hand-cut files, and that they were sent abroad; afterwards some doubt was manifested as to their being a genuine article. They were submitted to an expert. The expert was not myself, but a manufacturer in Sheffield. The samples were submitted to an expert and the opinion given as sought for, and those were the actual files, and that is the correspondence which passed between the parties.

Mr. Stuart-Wortley.

84. Where were these manufactured?—In Sheffield.

85. To what place were they sent for sale?—I believe it was the West Indies.

86. Just for the purpose of indentification, let me ask in what year did this case take place?—It is in the correspondence, if I may refer to it. I find it was in the year 1892.

87. Do Sheffield firms advertise in the leading trade journals hand-cut files, without mentioning the fact that they have at the same time several machines at work upon files on their premises?—They do; at all events, I can produce evidence as to one particular case.

88. Before we look at the advertisements, I will ask this further question: Are there certain firms in Sheffield who make hand-cut files and no others, and do they advertise in the same papers?—Yes.

89. Do you produce that class of advertisement?—Yes.

90. Is that the case of Messrs. Bury and Company; do they advertise their hand-cut files?—Yes; the Supplement to the "Ironmonger," for 2nd January 1895, contains the following: "Files guaranteed all hand-cut and of the best quality. The largest makers of hand-cut files in the world."

91. Those files, so far as you know, are genuine hand-cut?—Yes. I have a distinct knowledge of the business, and I know there are no machines used there in any shape or form.

92. You produce, do you not, for the purpose of comparison, the advertisement of two classes of manufacturers?—Yes.

93. Will you first read Messrs. Bury's advertisement?—"Files guaranteed all hand-cut and of the best quality. The largest makers of hand-cut files in the world." That, of course, has reference to files.

94. Will you hand that in?—Yes (handing in the same).

95. They

Mr. Jacks.

95. They do not say they have no machines?—They have none.

96. They do not say so in the advertisement?—No, they say "guaranteed all hand-cut." The other parties have machines, and they say, "manufacturers of hand-cut files"; but they never mention machine-cut files.

97. Neither party mention machines?—The one does not require to mention machines; the firm does not deal in machine-cut files at all.

98. What I am pointing out is that there is no difference in the two advertisements. Neither party refer to machines; both parties are advertising hand-cut files?—Yes, that is so; but the inference of the ordinary reader would from this advertisement be that from this firm he would expect to be supplied with hand-cut files, not machine-cut files.

99. There is no evidence to show that if they ordered hand-cut files they would not get them?—There is not.

100. There is no reason why a man should not advertise hand-cut, although he is also able to sell machine-cut files?—There is not; but it would be much more straightforward if the person was to advertise that they could be supplied with both.

Chairman.

101. Will you give us the other advertisement to which you referred, but which was not read out; will you read out the second one which you say is by a firm who professes to deliver hand-cut files, and does in fact use machinery?—All the reference to files is, "manufacturers of steel hand-cut files." I do not say that that is incorrect.

102. Just give me what is written in the advertisement, without any comment for the moment, and give us also the reference to the paper where the advertisement occurs?—It is in the Supplement to the "Ironmonger" of the 4th May 1895: "Manufacturers of steel hand-cut files"; that is the whole reference to files.

103. Then, I suppose, there is the name given?—Yes.

104. The first advertisement you have read is Messrs. Burys'; what is the name in the case of the second advertisement you have read?—The second is that of Messrs. Tyzack, Sons, and Turner.

105. Will you hand that in?—Yes (handing in the same). Then there is another advertisement on this matter that perhaps might go in at the same time. That is a case where a firm, when they believe that machine work is the best, advertise it. That advertisement is in the Supplement to the "Ironmonger" of 11th May 1895, and it reads as follows: "Osborn's patent machine-punched horse rasps." Those are understood as a class of file, and they also advertise (which we do not at all disagree with or contest) certain specialities and special advantages in connection with it.

106. Will you hand that in?—Yes (handing in the same). I mention that case in order to show that when people have an impression that machine-cut are the best, they are not afraid to advertise them.

Mr. Albert Bright.

107. Are those things which are advertised there as machine-cut also made by hand in Sheffield?—Yes.

108. The machine-cut ones are supposed to be superior to the hand-cut ones?—That is experience that we leave to experts. We believe that, given a fair opportunity of testing, and a fair opportunity of working, they are the best. It is possible for inferior workmanship to be done on both sides.

Mr. Stuart-Wortley.

109. In the case of the advertisement last handed in, it described the files as patent machine-punched horse rasps?—Yes.

110. Does that show that the firm issuing that advertisement consider that the machine-punched rasps are better than the others?—Yes; that is their opinion, I take it, or they would not advertise it.

111. You put these before the Committee as showing that in the other cases, for want of similar information, the consumer is practically misled?—Yes; he does not understand what he is buying, as he does when it is honestly advertised and stated.

112. Messrs. Burys, whom we spoke of just now, who are large manufacturers of hand-cut files, are in favour of this Bill, are they not?—They are.

113. Did they write a letter to the Board of Trade in June 1894?—They did.

114. In support of the Bill?—Yes. They have also confirmed that letter in the matter of the present Bill. I have a copy of their letter.

115. Have any other manufacturers of hand-cut files, I mean employers, supported the Bill?—I have nothing so definite as Messrs. Burys' letter. Of course, the difficulty with manufacturers of files is, that they do an interchange of trade one with the other, and they will submit to a good deal before they will complain; that is my experience. There are a number of manufacturers who strike upon the files "warranted hand-cut," and in that way they represent their wares before the public as what they are.

116. It has been represented that this Bill is an attempt to discourage the use of machine-made files; in other words, to substitute hand-cut entirely for them. Will you say what is the policy of your File Cutters' Union as regards that?—Do you mean as between machine-cutting and hand-cutting?

117. Yes?—I may say that for 18 years I have been, as I stated in opening, secretary of the association, and the question has never once been raised in any shape or form as to a dispute in regard to our men either assisting the machines or working the machines. In fact, a resolution was passed in 1866 to this effect: that our workmen should take employment on the machines where they had an opportunity; and I have to-day, in connection with our organisation, a number of men who are working on machines. We have never had the slightest dispute all the time I have been associated with the society in regard to machinery and hand-cutting. But our our position is this, that we have noticed for the last ten or a dozen years that there has been in various ways, such as I have indicated in my evidence, a manifest system of deception practised in the country.

118. My question related really to the practice of your union: in other words, your union does not discourage the membership of men who are employed in the machine-cutting industry?—No; we have a number of members now who are so employed.

119. Where men have applied to you for advice as to whether they should work at machine-cut files, what have you recommended?—We have recommended them to take the work and do it, certainly.

120. Is it true, in any way, to say your union discourages the use of machine-cut files?—Certainly not.

Mr. Charles Shaw.

121. Are any of the 2,500 signatures which you have obtained to these petitions you have referred to those of machine cutters, or are they strictly limited to hand cutters?—They are limited to hand cutters.

122. No machine cutters signed?—No; and the reason is this: that seeing that there is a very strong feeling manifested in the matter, and knowing that machine cutters had been canvassed to sign a petition against this Bill, we felt it would be very invidious to ask any man to place his name on a petition in such a way as was likely to jeopardise his situation; that is the reason why these signatories are all hand cutters. Some of them have worked at machines in the past, but they are not working at machines at the present day.

123. Therefore, although you have men on your union who are machine cutters, yet nevertheless they have not signed this petition?—They have not signed. They have never been requested to do so, for the reason I stated.

Mr. Stuart-Wortley.

124. On the question of practicability, it has been said it is not practicable to mark files in the way proposed; will you tell the Committee your views as to that?—If the objection stands upon the question as to the files being too small to be marked, I have a sample or two here which, I think, are rather small files; in fact, smaller than are generally cut with machines.

125. How would you describe them; are they 4 inches?—No; this is a 3-inch saw file, and it is marked "entirely hand-cut." It is plain and legible, and any gentleman can see and read it without glasses (handing in a file).

Mr. Albert Bright.

126. There are many smaller files than this file you have handed in, are there not?—Not as a rule cut by machinery.

Chairman.

127. Do you say there are none made by machinery smaller than that?—I do not say there are none; but the custom or the rule, at all events, with us, is that they do not get down to the smallest sizes. There are some. I have got some quite small ones here for example (producing some samples), but these run below the average sizes.

Chairman—continued.

Mr. Stuart-Wortley.

128. What do those range from?—Three, four, and five inches. They are the most difficult kind of files to mark legibly, and they are legibly marked, as you will see. There is no difficulty there; and as to the expense, it is a mere nothing

129. Do you know any firm that is already marking its machine-cut files?—There are several firms who mark hand-cut files.

Mr. Albert Bright.

130. Do they stamp machine-cut only?—No; they stamp hand-cut.

Mr. Stuart-Wortley.

131. But you know one firm, do you not, that marks its machine-cut files and not the hand-cut?—Yes, that is the firm of Osborn. I am informed they mark the whole of their machine-cut files "machine-cut"; but that they do not mark the hand-cut.

132. So that their case shows that it is practicable?—Yes.

Mr. Albert Bright.

133. Do they make small files?—They make all kinds of files.

Mr. Pierpoint.

134. Do you say that there is no machine-cut file of less size than this you have shown us?—No, I do not say there are none less; but I say, as a rule, the files run larger than that. There are some machine-cuts made abroad I believe, very small sizes; but in those cases it would not be a more difficult matter to deal with than the matter of the label; all that could be easily arranged. The great bulk of files are such that they could be easily marked.

Mr. Albert Bright.

135. The advantage of machinery is much greater in the large than in the small files, is it not, because then the heavy work is done by machinery instead of the arm?—Yes; and as a rule they pay better.

Mr. Stuart-Wortley.

136. It is said that this Bill is exceptional legislation, and that there is no precedent for it; what have you to say as to that?—I take it our position is this: that if the Act of Parliament is found insufficient to accomplish the objects for which it was framed, then, on evidence being forthcoming of the weak points, there should be an attempt to strengthen it, so as to protect the weak and ignorant as against those who are in a position to impose.

137. Is there not a precedent for compelling some mark to be placed upon goods in the case of the Margarine Act of 1887?—Yes. It was shown by the agricultural interest that it was interfering seriously with them, and the Government then took steps to protect them by legislating on the matter.

138. That

Mr. Albert Bright.

138. That Act is believed rather to have increased the use of margarine, has it not?—If this Act increases the use of machine-cut files, all the better for the machine makers. We do not care.

Mr. Stuart-Wortley.

139. Do you come here to assert in any way that machine-cut files are inferior to hand-cut?—I do not deal with that question at all. I believe, very likely, evidence may be forthcoming, if the Committee require it, from expert men, men who use the file, and who would be better able to speak as to its durability and wearing quality than myself. But, at the same time, I do maintain that when we find such firms as Messrs. Burys' and Messrs. Firth's and others of high reputation, and the largest firms in the city, continuing to cut the files by hand, and employing no machinery whatever, and still retaining their position, the only fault that they find being the undue and unfair competition by persons who do not deal as honourably (according to the view they take) as themselves. I take it that is clear evidence that, given a fair field and no favour, the hand-cut file will hold its own, and I venture to say, so far as I have obtained information, will beat the machine-cut files.

140. All you ask is that the consumer should know what he is buying?—That is all.

141. You believe that, without some such mark as is proposed by this Bill, he cannot be expected to know that?—It is impossible.

Mr. Charles Shaw.

142. Have you any idea of the ratio, speaking generally, of machine-cut to hand-cut files?—I can give it you by the number of men employed, which appears to me to be the fairest way to put it.

143. I do not think that is a fair criterion; what is the output?—I could not say positively as to the output. No doubt the machines put out a very large proportion of the large sizes. I could not say what the output is, but I can say this: that, so far as the persons engaged in the occupation go, they will stand something like 10 or 12 to 1; that is, the persons dependent upon the occupation for their livelihood.

144. Of the whole output of Sheffield in files would 75 per cent. be machine-cut?—No, certainly not.

Chairman.

145. Can you give us an idea of what is the proportion of hand-cut as compared with machine-cut files manufactured in Sheffield; which is the largest number?—I take it that the hand-cut is, taking the files on the whole, in consequence of the numbers employed.

Mr. Pierpoint.

146. Throughout the country, you mean?—Yes.

Mr. Jacks.

147. When you say "the numbers employed," do you mean the number of individuals or the number of files?—I take them both. The number of individuals is very much larger. There are a number of towns where they do not use machines at all, and I have to take the trade as a whole.

Mr. Stuart-Wortley.

148. Have you there the petition of the Association of File Manufacturers; that is to say, the employers who oppose this Bill?—They have petitioned against the Bill.

149. The fourth paragraph of that petition says that this is exceptional legislation, and there is no precedent for it. We have already dealt with that. Then the petition goes on to say, in the sixth paragraph, that "the Bill is promoted in the interest of one class of labour, the hand-cutters, as against another class of labour, the machine-cutters, equally as deserving in every respect. The Bill implies that hand-cutting is necessarily superior to machine-cutting, which implication the association entirely denies." Have you anything to say as to that paragraph?—I do not think I have got a copy of the petition at the moment.

Chairman.

150. Putting it shortly, is it your opinion that hand-cut files are superior to the others?—Yes, given a fair chance, I think they are.

Mr. Stuart-Wortley.

151. A great many users of files think the same, do they not?—Yes. I left that matter for the experts to bear more striking testimony upon.

Mr. Albert Bright.

152. I understood your answer a little while ago to be that you did not say one was better than the other?—I preferred to leave the matter to the expert users, although now that I have been put the question straight, my opinion is that the hand-cut files are better, given the same chance.

Mr. Jacks.

153. What do you mean by "given a fair chance"?—I mean to say there are some workmen who, if they are sweated to a point where they cannot put in the best work, naturally produce inferior work; but if they are employed at the proper standard rate they can do better.

154. That is a different thing; they cannot be made inferior with the machine, I suppose; when the steel is once put into the machine, the work is properly done with the machine, I presume; it cannot be scamped; you cannot sweat a machine?—I should say it is the very easiest thing in the world to produce most inferior stuff from a machine. The hand-cutter, when he is working, at every shifting, that is, at every space, has an opportunity of taking his tool out and repairing it, whetting it, and making it fit to produce a really splendid tooth; whereas in the machine the chisel is put in, and in many instances away it goes, side after side, till I have seen them become (as, for instance, in these files I have before me now) altogether unfitted for the work that they are intended to execute.

Mr. Jacks.

155. That may happen with the hand-cut ones, too, may it not?—In regard to the hand-cut files the hand-cutter has every facility for producing a really good tooth. Here is a file, for instance, I have before me that will show it (placing a file before the honourable Member).

156. If experts cannot detect the difference, I do not think I could?—Perhaps not.

Mr. Albert Bright.

157. I understand from what you say that inferior cut files can be produced either by hand-cut or machine-cut?—Yes, certainly they can.

158. And that the best files also can be produced by either?—That is, the best in their line. But then that does not determine the question as to which really is the best. You can produce the best in a certain line, but it may not be the best in another line.

Mr. Stuart-Wortley.

159. It is stated in the petition of the Association of File Manufacturers that hand-file cutting is injurious to health on account of the lead that is employed; have you any views on that point?—I have been somewhat interested in looking at the ages of our men since this question came up. I was surprised to find that a very large proportion, in fact, the great majority, of our men were between the ages of 30 and 49. Although it was said to be such an injurious trade, yet they bore comparison in the matter of age with the Amalgamated Engineers, who are supposed to be engaged in a much more healthy trade.

160. I suppose, if the trade is unhealthy, that is a matter for restrictive sanitary legislation, if for anything, is it not?—Yes; there has been considerable improvement in this matter of sanitation under the Factories and Workshops Acts, and no doubt the health of the men has been materially improved by enforcing better conditions as regards not allowing them to work so crowded together, and also as to better drainage.

161. Even if it were admitted for the sake of argument that hand-cutting be an unhealthy industry, that is not a reason why the consumer should be told a file is made by hand when it has been really made by machine, is it?—Not the slightest.

162. Do you agree with the statement of the employers in their petition, that the proportion of machine-cut files is growing greater every year?—I am not prepared to combat that, simply for this reason, that I find the practice that has been complained of (that is, placing goods in the market in order to secure orders at a cheap rate) has had the effect of causing the trade in machine-cutting to develop.

163. I think those are all the questions I have to ask. Is there any other point that you would wish to refer to?—There is one matter that I should like to mention, and that is as to the opinion of the general public on this Bill; that is to say, the large consumers or users of files.

164. Do you hand in a list of the large consumers of files who have signed in favour of this Bill?—I do; I have here the original.

165. Will you hand in that list?—Yes. (The same was handed in.) These gentlemen are all members of business firms, and have all signed in favour of the Bill; they have been waited upon personally on the subject.

166. Is this the petition they signed: "The Deception in the File Trade. To the Honourable the Commons in Parliament assembled and the Select Committee re Files Bill. Gentlemen,—In consequence of a large quantity of files cut by machinery now being placed on the market by Sheffield manufacturers and others, bearing no mark by which they can be distinguished, in many cases being represented as, and sold for, hand-cut files, to the permanent injury of the trade: We, the undersigned, being large buyers or consumers of files, hereby testify to our approval of the Bill now referred by your honourable House to a Select Committee, and trust that the result will be to provide for the marking of files in such manner as shall enable merchants, dealers, and consumers to know what they are purchasing, which is not the case at the present time"?—Yes.

Mr. Charles Shaw.

167. Speaking generally, can you tell the Members of the Committee who are not conversant with the trade, what the difference in price is between the machine-cut and hand-cut file of the same character, giving the ratio?—Of course, I am not a dealer in files; but I am informed that the difference is not above two and a-half on a file in some cases, or from two and a-half to five per cent. That is what I am informed, but I do not give that speaking as a retailer of files.

168. That is the addition for hand-labour in the case of hand-cut over machine-cut. I should like to ask whether in the case of the Indian Government railways, for example, when they tender for files they do not stipulate hand-cut, but they simply tender for files?—Yes.

169. But in many cases is it not well known that they expect hand-cut?—I believe that has been so in the past; and of course that way of sending out the tenders leaves it open for persons to supply either the one or the other, so that of course it is a matter which rests with the persons taking the contract. But if they have an understanding that hand-cut files are expected to be supplied, that places those persons who are disposed to deal squarely in the matter at a disadvantage.

170. That brings me to my next question: if on this Bill passing all files machine-cut were compelled to be marked "machine-cut," would it not come about that no one could supply files to the Indian Government railways save hand-cut files?—No, I think not, if it did not stipulate in the contract. If the files were marked "machine-cut," of course the authorities would be able to test for themselves without any fear as to the comparative quality of the files, and they would probably order straight what they wanted. If the machine-cut file was the best, they would order the machine-cut file; if the hand-cut file was the best, they would say, "supply us with hand-cut files." There would be a better chance of dealing straightforwardly, and there would be this benefit, that the manufacturer who wanted to deal straightforwardly and and honestly, would feel himself placed in a fair position.

Mr. Jacks.

171. That is assuming that one class is better than the other?—Yes; it would let him have a fair chance.

Mr. Charles Shaw.

172. The question I am putting is very practical, because I was told the other day that firm of merchants were supplying the Indian Government Railway with files, and that those files were always passed, because there was no work whatever upon them; that is to say, they were neither marked "hand-cut" nor "machine-cut," and they were always passed, but that if the files sent out were marked "machine-cut," the experts there would not pass them, and this firm would then be compelled to order its files from America, where they would be under no such legislation?—I do not take that view. I believe the Indian Government would be sufficiently business men to understand if they had an opportunity of testing which were the best value for the money; they would be eventually in a stronger position, and they would order that which was best. Of course, I can quite understand that if a person has been deceiving his customers, and there has been a revelation (and that is the strong objection on the part of the opponents to this Bill, in my opinion), many of them do not want the consumers to know exactly how they have been dealing. But that does not alter the fact that it is not a fair way of dealing. The best way of dealing is to sell the article for what it is and stand to the consequence. The reason why we lose our trade very largely in England is, because people have begun to lose confidence in the way in which we have manufactured our goods. I have had a long experience now, and I venture to express that as my opinion. That applies in more cases than one; it applies to more cases than files.

Mr. Scott Montagu.

173. Would you tell the Committee what you think is the practical advantage of the hand-cut over the machine-cut file when you come to use it; where is the hand-cut superior to the machine-cut?—So far as the file itself is concerned, generally speaking, there is more uniformity of character. If you order, say, from Messrs. Firth, a dozen of files hand-cut, I will venture to say they will be uniform in character. If you order a dozen files from a machine cutter, as I stated, they may have the files cut in a machine with a tool that has been used a long time, and consequently it will not produce as good a tooth, and further, we hold that it does not produce as good a tooth; consequently you get a more uniform character of file; and also the experience of expert mechanics who use these files is, that the durability of the hand-cut file compared with the machine-cut (that is in length of service) is manifest.

174. That is the point I wanted to get at. Is that because the row is really deeper and better done by the hand-cut process than by the machine-cut?—I take it that it is a better tooth; better calculated to stand hard work.

Mr. Scott Montagu—continued.

175. It does not clog up, as they say, so much as the machine files do?—I think you will have a witness before you who will explain that to you. I will not venture to say more than that.

176. Would you say for dealing with difficult and hard pieces of material all the big firms prefer hand-cut files to machine-cut?—There is great diversity of statement; but I have got a letter from Messrs. Bury's, whose interest lies in producing the very best article, in which they state that, after repeated tests and lengthened experience, and being in contact with other competing firms which produce machine-cut files, they find the adherence to hand-cutting is the best. That is stated in their letter which is here.

Mr. Jacks.

177. Messrs. Bury make only hand cut; they do not make machine-cut files; is not that so?—Certainly.

178. Therefore, naturally (I am not saying it in any disparaging way) it is probably their interest to advocate hand-cut files?—Yes; but Messrs. Bury's are practical men; they are men of the world and men of business, and their object is to maintain a very large trade and a good trade; and seeing that there is no objection in the way on the part of the men if they found by experience it was to their advantage, of course they would adopt machines; there is nothing in the world to prevent them. But their experience in conducting one of the largest, if not the largest, businesses in the whole of the city, is that hand-cutting is the best. I take it that their experience cannot be biassed at all, because it is only a question with them of producing the best article; they could put machines down to-morrow if they thought they were best.

Mr. Scott Montagu.

179. Reference has been made to the possibility of hand-cut files being imported from America. Have you any evidence to show that there are hand-cut files made in America?—There are hand-cut files made in America; but machines are largely used there, because of the scarcity of skilled workmen.

180. Is it the fact that hand-cut files from Sheffield and that district are imported into America now?—There are some; but, of course, the tariff has interfered with that.

181. There is a small import trade into America, is there?—Yes.

Mr. Jacks.

182. Do you know, as a matter of fact, whether within the last two years there has been a single hand-cut file sent into America from Great Britain; do you know that of your own knowledge?—If you mean by knowing it of my own knowledge have I made up consignments, I do not know of it in that sense; but I do know, as a matter of statement, that some files have been sent. Very few, I believe.

183. Can you tell me from the Board of Trade returns, for instance?—I have not noticed them; but but generally America, we understand, has been closed to us all round.

Mr. Charles Shaw.

184. Do you know whether American machine-made files have been imported into England in any number?—I have heard some have come, but I do not believe to any large extent.

185. Those are not hampered in any way by being marked as machine-cut, or otherwise cut?—No; but if this Bill passes they could not come in.

186. But they could go direct to our colonies; they could be sent to the customers of English merchants direct to India or direct to Australia?—Very likely they could; but the English manufacturers would be in this position, that they would have shown on their part there was no possibility of deception, so that you could get what you asked for; you could be supplied with machine or hand-cut as you wanted if this Bill was passed. The question of the foreigner competing with us is a question which, to my mind, appears to be outside this altogether, because they will compete with us in any case.

187. Is it your contention that this Bill, if it becomes an Act, does not add to the cost in any shape or form?—I should not be able to reckon it up by decimals.

188. If it is decimals in the units it becomes large in the aggregate, does it not?—Yes; but spread over the production of files it would simply be infinitesimal.

189. Then may I take it that this Bill if it becomes an Act would add to the cost?—There is just the extra expense of marking; there certainly is a little cost.

Mr. Jacks.

190. I wish to ask you just one or two questions on points which you have not made clear to me. In your leading evidence you pointed out the irregular cutting on some of the machine-cut files, and you said that could be done by making the tool go irregularly, as I understood?—Yes.

191. Is that done intentionally; is it done to imitate hand-cut files?—I have not seen myself, but I believe an honourable Member of this Committee has seen a circular advertising as one of the specialities in machinery that they are able to imitate the irregularity of the hand-cut files. That shows it is done with the intention to deceive.

192. Then why should they advertise it?—I understand I was mistaken in saying that it was advertised; but, at all events, it was made a special point of by the machine maker.

193. You said it was difficult, indeed almost impossible, even for experts to tell the difference?—That is on some classes of files. It is possible to imitate hand-cutting so closely that it would be almost impossible, on some classes of files, for an expert to detect the difference; but in the main an expert cutter would be able to detect it.

194. Then when is the detection made?—That is a question as to who you regard as the expert. Do you regard the expert as a person like myself, who has been brought up to understand how to manipulate tools?

Mr. Jacks—continued.

195. Supposing I buy from you a quantity of files, and you send them as hand-cut, and I cannot tell, and no expert can tell, whether they are hand-cut or not, when do I discover I have been cheated?—You would find it in the wear of the article.

196. Your contention is that a hand-cut file wears longer than a machine-made file?—Yes.

197. Then does that relate to the quality of steel of which the file is made or to the quality of the workmanship that is put into it?—The quality of the steel is the foundation of the file, and, of course, upon that depends what the file is in the output undoubtedly. But I take it when we are discussing a question of this kind, we are discussing the merits of files made from the same quality of steel but by different processes.

198. That is exactly what I mean; your contention is that the hand-made file, owing to the manner in which it is cut, wears longer than the machine-made file?—I do not want to make that a speciality. My point is this——

199. That was the reply you made to my direct question, as I understood?—Possibly so; but that is not specially the point. The special point is this, that deception is practised, and that people cannot detect the deception until it is made, and whether it be better or worse no person has a right to be supplied with things that they have not asked for.

200. That is a matter of opinion we are not called upon to decide; what we are called upon to decide is this: I put a direct question to you, and the reply was that a hand-cut file lasted longer, owing to the character of the hand-cutting as against the cutting by machine?—Yes, you can take that as my experience.

201. I understood you disclaimed that answer just now; but you still adhere to it, do you?—I did not intend to disclaim it.

202. You said that was not the point, but that the point was that it was better to have a mark. May I take it now that what you say is that the cutting by hand gives a character to the file that enables it to wear longer than if cut by machine?—That is my intention.

203. Is that difference caused by undue friction by the cutting chisel of the machine, or how do you consider it is caused?—There are a number of reasons. A man may work a machine who is not a practical cutter, and does not understand how to prepare his tools.

204. I am speaking now of files that are cut in such a way that no mortal man can tell whether they are cut by machine or hand. I take it that the grooves are of equal depth, and that the little points or excrescences are all of equal shape. That being so, if there is a difference in the wear, it necessarily follows that the quality of the steel must be affected by that operation; for if there was anything in the depth of the groove, or in the shape of the nodules, or by whatever term you describe them, then any man could tell the difference between a hand-cut and the machine-cut files; could could he not?—No, he could not; he would have to have a very long experience to do so.

205. Experts, of course, have a long experience; what is your reply to the objection I have pointed out?—The case you have put as to not being able to detect the difference between the two is very exceptional.

206. That is not quite what you said before, as I understood. I understood, as to all these samples which you have produced, that it was with the utmost difficulty you could make out which they were?—I have no doubt the purchaser cannot make out; but I made them out without the slightest difficulty.

207. Experts, you said, often could not make them out?—I said there were classes of files which experts had difficulty in making out.

208. Supposing the buyer cannot make them out, you will admit, I presume, that in that case they must resemble each other exceedingly closely?—Yes.

209. If they resemble each other so closely, and yet one wears so much longer than the other, how do you explain the fact that the one should wear longer than the other in any other way than that the one operation affects the quality of the steel in a different way from the other?—I explain it in this way: it is due to the character of the tooth that is put on. It may appear regular, but it may be very shallow: in the one case, it may be a tooth which after it is worn a little while is done for, on the other hand it may be a good, firm, deep tooth.

210. If the file is not deeply cut, I could tell it or anybody could tell it, could they not?—Yes, perhaps so.

211. I am speaking about two files as to which you cannot tell the difference?—I say those are exceptional cases.

212. If you can easily tell the difference the whole game is up, you will understand, in putting these questions. I have no bias one way or the other; I do not care a straw as between the two; I only want to get at the truth of the matter. You say, here are two files, one made by machinery and one made by hand; from outward appearances, from the depth of the groove, and the shape of the nodules, an ordinary workman could not tell the difference?—Yes.

213. You take those two files, and you find that one of them wears longer than the other?—Yes.

214. Now, seeing that they are both cut to the same depth, and that every excrescence upon the file is of the same shape, does not it suggest itself to you that if the one wears longer than the other it must be because the quality of the steel has been affected by the process of manufacture?—The ordinary purchaser of a file looks at the file, and he sees so many teeth on it.

215. We have admitted all that; we have it admitted that the ordinary purchaser cannot tell the difference, and we have it admitted that the ordinary workman who uses the file cannot tell the difference; that is so, is it not?—Before he wears it.

216. My point is, can you offer any explanation as to why the one wears longer than the other, seeing that they are identically the same?—Because one is a better class of tool than the other.

Mr. Jacks—continued.

217. I do not understand what you mean by its being a better class of tool; that is not answering my question; my question is, when they are both identically the same so far as outward appearances go, the groove being of the same depth, and the shape of the excrescence being the same, wherein lies the superiority?—The appearance of the tooth may be the same in every respect, and still the one file may be much better cut and better fitted for its work than the other.

218. And yet it would be impossible for a workman to tell the difference?—The ordinary workman could not tell until he came to wear it.

219. I can only say they are not the class of workmen I have been in the habit of controlling; however, if you say that it is a mystery, and you cannot answer the question, I will not press it any further; but as a matter of personal experience, which is, I think, of interest to the Committee, I think one ought to have either a reply or an acknowledgment. It is no discredit to you to say you cannot tell what the reason is; but I think the important point is this: if the grooves are of the same depth, and the shape of the excrescences is the same, and the outward appearance is absolutely identical, then, so far as my experience leads me, the quality of the material must have been affected by the operation; otherwise, why should the one wear longer than the other?—There might be something in the material. If you had good material in the file it would wear better than a common one.

220. You are not answering my question?—I am trying to do so.

221. Do you see what I mean?—Yes; but my point is this: that an ordinary person cannot tell whether the tooth is deeper or not, or whether it is set better than the other, until he comes to wear it. Judging from the general appearance of the file, he not having the two to compare, one may appear to be as good as the other; still, in wear it may turn out it is not, because the tooth is not exactly the same.

222. That is what I want to get at; how is it that the one wears better than the other, when they are both identically the same so far as outward appearances are concerned. You say, do you not, that in some cases it would puzzle anybody to distinguish them?—Yes, it is so. For instance, I might get a file specially cut by machine to so closely imitate a hand-cut one, that you could not detect it when you looked at it.

223. These are all statements one would like to have some example of, and the point I have taken is one which impressed itself very much upon my mind the whole time you were giving evidence; and now, when I come to put the question, you rather incline to go back upon your evidence, and to say that you can tell the difference, that the grooves are not cut so deep, and so on?—In the ordinary class of file.

224. Do I rightly understand this: that a machine-cut file is cut in such a way that the grooves are not sufficiently deep, so that an ordinary intelligent workman, say an engineer, can tell the difference?—No, generally speaking he cannot; he has not been trained to detect the difference.

Mr. Jacks—continued.

225. Then does the hand-cut file wear so much longer than the machine-cut file because the grooves are deeper?—There is a better tooth on, whether the grooves are deeper or not. It is possible for a machine-cut file to be knocked in, and a deep tooth made; but still it would not wear so well as a file that was not knocked in. The question is the adaptation to the work.

226. That is another question altogether; that is the choice of a file suitable to the work?—Yes.

227. What I want to know is, if the files are both the same can you not say wherein consists the quality which makes the hand-cut file wear longer than the other. If you cannot tell us, just say so, and that finishes the matter?—If you suppose that the tooth is exactly the same, and is put on in the same way in every shape and form, and the material is the same, then those two files should, at all events, run pretty well together in wear, if it is so; but my contention is——

228. Never mind your contention. As I understand, in the end we have arrived at this point, that in the case of two files, one made by hand and the other by machine, where the depth of the groove and the shape of the tooth are absolutely the same, the one will wear, or ought to wear, as well as the other?—My contention is, that only a practical engineer, who has worked at the bench, and knows all the working of it, is the man to give an opinion upon that.

229. You are not in a position to give an opinion?—I am not an expert upon that.

230. You are not in a position to give an opinion?—I give an opinion, but it is only for what it is worth. I am not a practical engineer.

231. Now, coming to No. 2 case to which you referred, which is the Admiralty order; I think perhaps the examination was not quite complete, because in the last sentence of your answer, when Mr. Stuart-Wortley asked you about the detection, you said "they never detected the difference"?—Can you tell me in what connection I said that. Who was it that never detected the difference?

232. When did the Admiralty find out that they were getting machine-cut files instead of hand-cut?—When our expert went down to the dockyard and examined them.

233. What suggested to them sending for an expert; how were suspicions aroused at the Admiralty that they were not getting hand-cut files?—From a statement that was made.

234. Attention was called to it?—Yes.

Mr. Stuart-Wortley.

235. In that case the vendor of the files took a different view of the facts; did not the manufacturers contend that on the Admiralty order they were entitled to supply machine-cut files as much as hand-cut?—No, that point was never contested; it was admitted at once that the order was supplied wrongly; the mistake was put on the manager.

236. I only brought that case forward for the purpose of showing that the Admiralty experts might be deceived?—Quite so.

Mr. Jacks.

237. Now, coming to case No. 3, you said there was one hand-cut file in every parcel?—In each of the two parcels.

238. And that they were very bad?—Yes.

239. Were the machine-cut files good?—They were sound files; that is to say, they rung. I do not say they were good.

240. May I ask if the inference from your evidence is that the machine files were put in good, and the hand-cut ones put in bad, in order to create prejudice in favour of the machine-cut files?—I am not prepared to say that.

241. Then what is the object of the evidence?—The object of the evidence is to show that a large business was being done in files that were stated to be hand-cut, and were machine-cut in the main.

242. I quite understand, and I am perfectly satisfied. Then you said there was no name whatever upon the files?—No.

243. Would that be a very suspicious fact to the ordinary mind?—It might be; it would be so to me.

244. So that in that case the buyer was so much of a fool that one could hardly pity him. Then in the case of the West Indian order, I think you said there was no prosecution?—There was not.

245. I would like just to ask a question or two about the question of advertising. In their advertisement, Messrs. Burys say that their files are "guaranteed all hand-cut"?—Yes; "guaranteed all hand cut."

246. And the words "all hand-cut" are in heavy leaded type, are they not?—The words "hand-cut" are.

247. That being so, would it not be exceedingly unfair, and indeed I will say, would it not be dishonest, if Messrs. Bury had machines in the face of that advertisement?—Certainly.

248. Now, take Tyzack Sons, and Turner; they have a very different advertisement; they simply say, "manufacturers of steel hand-cut files and saws." They made a great many things besides files and saws?—Yes; so do Bury's.

249. Which are not stated in that advertisement?—Yes.

250. Now, is there anything wrong in their not putting in machine-made files any more than there is not putting other things which they make?—I do not say there is anything wrong in that. I simply brought it up as showing the different kind of advertisement, and the fact that they did not advertise machine-cut files.

251. Let us be quite frank with each other; the feeling in your mind was that Messrs. Tyzack ought to have advertised their machine-made files as well as the hand-cut?—Yes, to have put them on a level with Bury's.

252. Now, coming to the third firm whose advertisement you quoted, they apparently absolutely glory in their shame, because they advertise machine-made files; that firm evidently believe that machine-made files are as good as hand-made?—Yes, but they do not advertise the hand-made.

253. But they do make hand-made files, I understood you to say?—Yes.

254. So

Mr. Jacks—continued.

254. So that here we have one firm who makes only hand-made files, and advertises them?—Yes.

255. We have another firm who makes both classes of files, and only advertises the machine-made ones?—Yes.

256. We have a third firm, Messrs. Tyzack, who also make both classes, and they only advertise the hand-cut ones?—Yes.

257. Does not that seem to indicate that it is a matter of individual choice and opinion which advertisement will take the market best?—No doubt they put in that which they think will take best.

258. So that this question of advertisement absolutely amounts to nothing; it does not show any intention whatever to deceive the public; because if Messrs. Tyzack want to deceive the public by advertising only hand-cut files, does not it occur to you that the third firm seeks equally to deceive the public in advertising only the machine-cut files?—You have put it very strongly in your question. I do not say they did do that. A person has a right, as you put it, to advertise whatever he likes, provided what he advertises is correct; but this is only part statement.

259. It is part statement in both cases, is it not?—Yes, it is.

Mr. Stuart-Wortley.

260. Do Osborn's, as a matter of fact, turn out any hand-cut horse rasps, because the "machine-punched" only applies to "horse rasps"?—I could not answer that question. They might turn out a very good hand-cut rasp, for anything I know. I have no feeling, of course, against Osborn's or against Tyzack's, you will quite understand.

Mr. Jacks.

261. I quite understand that; I think we may dismiss the advertisements; at any rate, they do not weigh very much with me; there is one question I would ask: you said, and I am perfectly sure with every desire to be accurate, that there was no difference whatever in the conditions or standing in your union of the machine men and the hand cutters?—Yes; that is to say, they are admitted on the same terms.

262. Do they get the same wages?—They are paid according to the standard for machine cutters.

263. Which of them average the most?—I could not tell you. Some would earn more and some would earn less. It depends a good deal upon the form of work and the class of work upon which they are employed.

264. One of your replies I did not quite follow; my honourable Friend asked you if, in that list of 2,500, there were any others than hand cutters who signed the petition?—Not to my knowledge.

265. The reply you gave, very properly, was that you did not ask the machine men, and the reason you gave (and it was this that made me wonder a little) was that asking the machine cutters to sign it would jeopardise their situations?—It might.

266. Just so. The hand cutters work in shops where there are also machine cutters, do they not?—They do not all work together.

267. But they work in the same employment; I suppose, for instance, some of the hand cutters of Messrs. Tyzack, Sons, and Turner may have signed?—Yes.

268. Does not it suggest itself to you that those who work in shops where they have both hand-cut and machine-cut files would jeopardise their situation to a much greater degree than those who only work in the hand-cut shops?—No doubt I am a little bit imperfect in apprehending the point. I think there is some little misunderstanding between us. The position I took was simply this: The petition was sought for from the hand cutters who were in favour of this Bill. I have not got the signatures myself.

269. I quite accept all that?—So far as I am concerned, the signatures of the machine cutters have not been sought, because it was felt they stood in a somewhat invidious position.

270. Because it would jeopardise their situations?—Yes. I was informed, for instance, that one man made a statement that he did not like to sign because he did not care for his employer to know he was signing.

271. The point I want to make is this: I can quite understand the reason why all Bury's men signed, because they are all hand cutters; but in the other workshops where they have both machine and hand cutting, would not a man who is a hand cutter and signed in that shop jeopardise his position to a much greater degree because he shows a preference?—I do not think so. He is in this position: he is a member of our society, and, as a rule, the machine cutters are not members, because they have a society of their own. But there are some who belong to our society, and naturally we look to the men who belong to our society to support anything that belongs to our society.

272. I will not pursue that further. Then there was a question just suggested, but not pressed; do you know anything whatever of the foreign-made files, in Germany, for instance, and America?—I have seen them.

273. Do you know anything of them?—As a merchant, do you mean?

274. Have you been there?—No.

275. You have never seen any of the works in Germany or America?—No.

276. Practically you could not speak upon that?—I could not speak upon that.

277. Mr. Stuart-Wortley asked whether there was any precedent for this special legislation, and you instanced the Margarine Act; I understood that was the only precedent that was quoted?—The watch trade would be another; I did not think of it at the time. The watch trade was protected when it was shown that it was necessary to protect it.

278. That was done against the manufacturers in Switzerland chiefly, was it not?—Yes.

279. What I want to ask you is this: Does not it suggest itself to your mind that in both those cases the object was to prevent the unfair competition of the foreigner. My point is this: I want to point out to you the difference between protecting home industries against unfair, and, in some point of view, dishonest, and foreign competition, and of differentiating between one mode of manufacture and another in this country; so that, in point of fact, you admit that that is no precedent with regard to the principle of the present case. The fact is this, to my mind: that wherever fraud and deception are practised we are bound, as a legislature, to see that steps are taken to prevent it.

280. You have used the word "deception" two or three times; what is the difference in cost, or in price, between hand-made files and hand-cut files; is it 2½ per cent. difference?—Yes, I was informed that it was 2½ to 5; it may be more.

281. Do you think that any respectable firm, for the sake of 2½ per cent., would wilfully deceive any one?—I believe there are plenty of people deceived for less than 2½ per cent.

282. The next point I want to ask you about is this: I think at the end of our conversation you admitted that a file made by machine would wear as long as the file made by hand?—No, I scarcely admitted that.

283. I think you will admit this: You say that the tendency was more in the direction of increasing the manufacture of machine-made files than of hand-made files?—It has been so in consequence, I maintain (and others who are able to form an opinion) of the deceptions which have been practised which have compelled a number of manufacturers to follow suit in order to get orders for files, because the file is a leading article; that is where it is: so that you are forced to adopt measures you do not approve of.

284. I quite agree with that, and I quite approve of it; but do not you think the file makers would be rather foolish if they did not adopt machines, seeing that machine-made files are so similar in quality. I think you admitted there was no difference?—No, I do not admit that.

285. The next point is this: You said that we lose markets because consumers have lost confidence in the way in which we make our goods. What home or foreign markets have we lost owing to the consumer having lost confidence in the way we make our goods?—I believe there is a lot of stuff now made abroad that is bought up because it is sold cheap, in consequence of people not being sure they will get what they bargain for and pay for in England.

286. That is exactly the reason I expected, because I know it is exactly what is occurring elsewhere. The reason why the consumer takes the foreign made article is because it is cheap, is it not?—If a person pays a better price there is no guarantee in files that he is bound to get the best.

287. Never mind; the reason why he buys the foreign made article is because it is so much cheaper, is it not?—I could not always say that, but in the main I daresay it is.

288. I will put one question, which I ask by courtesy, it is not perhaps evidence: If that is the case, would not it be the better for this country to produce the files as cheaply as possible without having regard to the quality?—I do not think so. A file is a tool with which a man has to earn his living, and the best thing to do is to ensure getting as good an article as you can, but in any case knowing what you are purchasing.

Mr. Pierpoint.

289. Is there anything on the face of the file, or in the use of the file, that would show the ordinary purchaser any difference between a foreign made file and an English made file, whether hand or machine made?—I do not know of anything.

290. I mean on the file itself?—I do not know of anything.

291. If I go into a shop and buy a file, not being a skilled workman, but only an amateur in the use of the file, is there anything, if I ask for a hand-cut file, to point out to me that I am being supplied with a hand-cut file, or with a machine-cut file as a hand-cut file?—As an ordinary purchaser there is nothing.

292. Is there a process in file-making called "sand blasting"?—There is.

293. Will you tell me whether a file can be at the same time hand-cut and sand blasted?—Yes.

294. It can be?—Yes.

295. Is that the case with the small as well as with the large files?—Chiefly the large files.

296. Can the small files be sand blasted and hand-cut?—Yes, I suppose they could.

Mr. Albert Bright.

297. In whose interest has the movement for this Bill been commenced?—In the interests of the workmen and in the interests of consumers who have communicated with me on various occasions (as I cited in my evidence) stating that they themselves were being deceived, and that difficulties were created in the market.

298. Did the complaints come first from the consumers?—In several of the principal cases mentioned communications were made to me by persons who were in the file trade; but a large factor in the case was the fact that we found, as a society, that certain firms were sending out a large quantity of files which we had good reason to believe were ordered to be hand-cut, but were being done by machine, and our workmen were walking about the streets doing nothing. Naturally, in self-defence, we took up the question in conjunction with others.

299. Then I understand you that the agitation was originated by the workmen, who thought that their work was being taken away from them unjustly, and not by the consumers of the files, who thought that they were being cheated?—You may say in conjunction with both, sir; because I have repeatedly had communications from persons who have found difficulties.

300. There is a long list here of people who use files; some of them eminent firms?—Yes.

301. Can you tell me anyone of these firms that made a complaint that the files the firm were buying were really machine-cut when they were expected to be hand-cut?—Not direct to me.

302. To anybody; for the purpose of starting the agitation for this Bill I understand you to say that certain people have complained of being deceived?—Yes.

303. That was the origin of the thing, because I understand this thing is to protect the public against deception?—Yes.

304. Have some of these firms complained that they have been deceived in that way by being supplied with machine-made files instead of hand-made files?—Some of the Birmingham people (that is the hand-cutters) and some of our people in the engineering and cutlery trades have repeatedly had conversations with me upon the matter, but so far as regards any of those particular firms communicating direct, I cannot say that they have done so.

305. You mean to say the masters have complained, do you, or do you mean those employed by them?—Some of the people.

306. You mean the masters who buy files, and give them to the workmen to use?—Yes, that is the information I have gathered from other people; I have never had anything direct on that.

307. Therefore, I understand the complaint in the main originates with the makers of the hand-made files, who have not been well employed lately?—Those are the parties that have taken action.

308. That was really the first step towards it, and not complaints made by people who consumed the files?—It has been a matter of general complaint. Manufacturers have said themselves that they are offering files at such a price that they must be machine-cut files, or they could not offer them at the price; consequently we cannot do our business.

309. The machine-cut files, then, are underselling the hand-cut files?—Yes.

310. And the intention of this Bill is to try to prevent people using machine-cut files to the detriment of the trade of hand-cut files?—The object of the Bill is to ensure that there should be a fair field and no favour. If the article is described as "machine-cut," then the public know what it is, and no one can complain; at present they can.

311. Suppose it is not described as anything, and that people do not wish to specify whether it is hand-cut or machine-cut, what is the object, then, of putting on the mark?—In order to be able to determine between the qualities of the two, certainly.

312. Suppose I use in my business a great number of machine and hand-cut files indiscriminately and do not care in the least which they are, what interest is it to me as a consumer to have "hand-cut" or "machine-cut" on the file?—Suppose you use them indiscriminately and you pay more for the hand-cut files; suppose you pay two and a-half or five per cent. more and get supplied with machine-cut files; you are at a disadvantage. Your interest lies in knowing what you are buying, and in paying what you know to be the market price for the goods.

313. Suppose you find that the machine-cut file works just as well as the hand-cut?—Very well; then you will adhere to the machine-cut if you can get it cheaper and no one is injured.

314. Can all files be made by machine; files of all sort?—It has not been done here yet. I am not prepared to say whether they can make all kinds by machinery; they can make most of them.

315. Is it not the fact that most files are cut on one side by machinery, and that the other side is finished by hand?—I know a case of that kind, if you mean the half rounds, of course.

316. The half rounds?—In many cases the flat side is cut by machinery, and the half-round side is cut by hand; in many cases, of course, they are finished by the machinery.

317. Is it not the fact that there are many cases of half-round files to which machinery is not adapted, and in which it does not pay to use it?—Yes: a machine can finish a half round file; there is no difficulty about that, nor "rounds" either.

318. But there are some things, are not there, that it would be very difficult to adapt a machine to cut?—They are out-of-the-way sort of things. There are many things which do not come in in large orders, but in small quantities, and it does not pay to put them on the machine in any case, so that the hand-cutters have to do them.

319. Is not the fact that one firm marks "machine-cut" on the files it sells evidence that there is a strong presumption that machine-cut files are just as good as hand-cut?—Yes; I take that as an argument in favour of the Bill, because if one firm can afford to do it there is no reason why the others should not; not the slightest.

320. Why should not the makers of hand-cut files mark "hand-cut" on their files?—Many of them do, but I hold this: it is no reason why I should be taken under the care of the police because there are a lot of rogues about. They look after the rogues; they do not look after me; I am an honest man.

321. I do not quite understand you; you and your association are the movers in trying to get a Bill passed to make makers of a certain quality of files mark what they are on them?—Yes.

322. Would not the purpose be equally well answered by your marking on your superior goods how they are made?—No; I do not think it is fair to impose any disability, if it may be called a disability, or any conditions, on hand cutters who have never deviated from straightforward business and leave other people alone who are deviating from it and doing things they ought not to do.

323. Has there ever been a case of a hand-cut file being supplied where a machine-cut file was wanted?—I do not know.

324. As it appears that some people are of opinion that machine-cut files are better than hand-cut files, is it not quite possible that hand-cut files may have been substituted for orders for files which were intended to be machine-cut?—Possibly they might; and it just amounts to this, that if that is practised it may be done with the intention of pushing the machine. That complicates the business more, and makes the position stronger for saying that they should be marked.

325. Have you ever heard of a case in this country in which a distinction has been made by a trade mark between two things in which there was only this difference, that one was made by hand and the other by machinery?—I do not call anything to my recollection about that.

326. For instance, would you think it would be a reasonable thing to mark cotton cloth that is made on a hand-loom, "hand-loom made," to distinguish it from what is made on a power-loom, or that bread that is kneaded by hand should be marked differently to bread kneaded in a machine?—I think that is altogether a different thing.

327. I think it is precisely the same thing, it is just a question of hand making?—There is no question of deception as between hand made bread and machine made bread.

328. Do not you think machine made bread is likely to be cleaner than hand made bread, and that therefore there might be deception in selling hand made bread for machine made bread?—That is a thing that does not exist. We are trying to deal with things that do exist.

329. I may take it that you do not know of any instance in which Parliament has stepped in to make a distinction between one thing and another, simply because the one thing has been made by hand, and the other by machinery?—Not to my knowledge.

330. Therefore this is quite a new departure?—I am not so sure of that.

Mr. Burt.

331. At the commencement of your evidence you mentioned petitions that had been presented in support of the Bill that we are now considering?—Yes.

332. I think you said that one of those petitions had been signed by upwards of 2,500 people in the aggregate?—Yes.

333. From different towns?—Yes, that is the file cutters.

334. And I think you said in answer to some questions that were put to you afterwards that you are not aware whether those that signed the petition were all hand cut file makers?—I did not collect the evidence myself. I did not get the signatures myself, and I thought I made it clear that only those who were working at the trade and depending upon it for a livelihood had signed the petitions. I thought I also made it clear that they were persons (at any rate, I intended to, if I did not) who were likely to have families and others dependent upon them, because there were 1,248 of them in Sheffield and the district alone, whose ages ranged between 20 and 49.

335. I do not know that that is very material. What I want to be at is this, if you can tell me, the total number of workmen employed in the trade as hand-file cutters?—In the industry?

336. Yes?—Of course, I have not got the whole of the signatures of the persons employed in the trade, but a very careful estimate brings it out that there are between 3,000 and 4,000 in various parts of the country. There are some places where file-cutters are employed, for instance, in London, where they have not been worked up, also in Liverpool, also in Cardiff.

337. You said, in answer to Mr. Stuart-Wortley, as I understood you, that as regards the policy of your union, you do not distinguish between the hand-cut and the machine cut workers?—No, we draw no distinction.

338. How many members have you in your union; what would be the total number?—There are between 1,700 and 1,800 on the books.

339. And what proportion of those would be hand-cut workers?—The great bulk of them. The men that have gone to work at the machines do not number above a dozen, all told; they are very very few; but my point is this, that we have never raised any objection to going to the machine; when they go to the machine they continue their membership, and there is no distinction in any shape or form between them and the others.

340. And you raise no difficulties in the way of admitting the machinemen, in fact, you welcome them; you are quite as ready to accept them as the hand-cut men?—Any that are brought up to the trade are quite welcome to join.

341. In speaking of the petitions, you referred to the London Trades Council, and then you said it was last year that they petitioned?—Yes.

342. They have not petitioned this year in favour of the Bill, have they?—No, they have not; but I have no doubt it only requires placing before them. The reason why it has not been done is that the secretary has been ill, and the matter has not been brought before them again.

343. You have no reason to suppose that they have receded from their position of supporting you?—Oh, no.

344. With regard to this list you have been good enough to hand to us, it says, "list of consumers who have signed"; does that mean who signed petitions to Parliament, or what does the word "signed" refer to?—That is the original (handing the same to the honourable Member).

345. Of course that answers my question. This is a printed copy; but I suppose the petition itself has been presented to Parliament?—It was brought before this Committee for the first time; it will be forwarded to Parliament.

346. You have told us how difficult it is for the ordinary consumer to distinguish the hand-cut from the machine-cut file, and you have been so elaborately questioned on that subject that I do not think I need pursue it further; but you have stated that the difficulty lends itself to fraud and deception. You gave us certain instances of cases in which machine-cut files had been supplied when hand-cut files were ordered. Am I right in concluding that all those were home made files. You did not bring any evidence of any that had been imported from other countries, I think?—All home made, every file of them.

347. With regard to instances of that kind, I suppose you are aware that it is an offence against the Merchandise Marks Act for machine-cut files to be supplied if hand-cut files are ordered and placed on the invoice; it is an offence now against the Act?—Yes, if they are marked.

Mr. Stuart-Wortley.

348. There must be a mark, must not there?—That is a moot point.

Mr. Burt.

349. You allege that there must be a mark; that simply ordering hand-made and then others being supplied is not fraud, at least it is not an offence against or a violation of the Merchandise Marks Act?—Well, as I have understood it, it is an offence against the law; you could take action against the person who defrauded you in that way.

350. Then, as far as that is concerned, no alteration is needed?—In a case of that kind possibly not; but the great difficulty there is in following up and ascertaining and protecting oneself from such-like things certainly necessitates some legislation, and the legislation talked of; that is my opinion.

351. Are you much affected by foreign competition in your trade?—No, we have not felt it.

352. Most of the cases of which you complain are really home-made cases?—Yes.

353. Then, with regard to the practicability of marking, you have brought before us some specimens of files, and you say there is really no practical difficulty in marking even the smallest file?—So far there is no practical difficulty in going down to the smallest that are (generally) at present executed by machine; and in cases where it was found difficult to mark, there would be no difficulty, or but little difficulty, in arranging that a label should be put upon the files; but so far as present experience as to the size of the files cut by machinery is concerned, there would be no practical difficulty.

354. Then as to cost, would the cost of the production be increased to any appreciable extent?—Certainly not; oh, no; in a large firm one man would mark the whole output of the firm. The marks are very cheap. A two shilling or half-crown mark would last a year or two with care. Of course they would require several marks very likely, but still that is not a factor which needs to enter into the question at all.

355. You instanced the Margarine Act as a case somewhat analogous to this?—Yes.

356. But was not that Act passed to protect the public against fraud mainly?—Yes; so would this be. A man that has got to get his living by the use of a file has as much right to be protected if he is imposed upon as a man that eats butter. It is not everybody who eats butter, and it is not everybody who uses a file.

357. Has there been any very strong general exhibition of public feeling, by petitions or otherwise, showing the necessity of new legislation?—There has been a very strong feeling, I think, as indicated by the fact that I have appealed to the various trades councils, representing about 34,000, and they have petitioned Parliament. I will cite, as an instance, the Amalgamated Engineers. They are men that you might expect to be opposed to this Bill if there was any prejudice at all, seeing that they make machines; but they are thoroughly with us, and have actually taken steps to help us, and have appointed a witness to come here and speak on their behalf on this question. You will have an opportunity of having him before you.

Mr. Hazell.

358. There have been so many questions asked that I do not need to trouble you long, but I should like to ask two or three. I understand the total number of hand file-makers in the kingdom is, as far as you know, 3,000 to 4,000?—Yes.

359. Does that include women and young persons?—Yes. There is not a very large quantity of women. The number of women, perhaps, as far as we can make out, is about 400.

360. The remainder are men and boys?—Yes; men and boys.

361. How many workers are there of the machine-cut file, do you think, society and non-society?—The statement was made some little time ago by an official of the Machine Cutters' Society that their numbers ran from 230 to 260. They are in connection with the Federated Trades Council organisation, and they represent 180 of them.

362. Then are there many non-society machine cutters?—That includes all. When the question was put, it was said that from 230 to 260 are machine cutters.

363. Society and non-society?—Yes.

364. Some questions have been asked as to health; you were asked: is there any lead used in hand-cutting, and you said, as I understood, that lead is used, but that it is not an unhealthy trade; there is no lead-cutting, is there?—No; but they have to have beds, just the same as though there were. The hand-cutter, of course, handles the lead more.

365. On the question of health I will ask you a straight question: suppose you were putting your son into the file-cutting trade, and you, on the ground of health alone (apart from wages), wished to decide whether you would put him into the hand-cutting or the machine-cutting, which would you do?—Well, as a practical workman I should put him to the same occupation as that which I follow.

366. I do not think you would?—There are men in our trade, working at the trade to-day, that are 75 years of age. I am very sorry I have not it here; but at the hotel I left a photograph of 20, and the average age of those men is about 65 years.

367. If you were deciding on the question of health, which of the two branches of the trade you would choose for your son; do you say you would not care which it was?—With care a hand file-cutter lives to, as I say, as fair an age as a great number of others.

368. That is not quite an answer to my question; you, as a father, you would regard your son's health; if the wages were the same, and prospects in other respects were the same, and you and your wife were particular on the ground of health, would you put him to one branch or to the other, or would not you care which?—I am not in a position to judge as to machine-cut as regards his health. I can tell you this: that some of our men have gone into the machine shop and they have come away from the machine shop on the ground that they could not stand the enormous rattle and strain there was in the noise, on the machinery; and although hand-cutting may affect men, still the nerves are affected by the machinery. That is my experience so far as regards some of our men who have turned into the cutting shop.

369. Then as to the way in which the public are deceived about these machine-cut files, it is rather difficult to get at the facts; I will not press this question if it is not within your own knowledge;

knowledge; but, suppose a working engineer would use in a certain period a dozen hand-made files, and suppose he was deceived and had machine ones thrust upon him, how many do you think he would want for the same period?—Well, I will leave that for the practical engineer who will come before the Committee to answer; I think that will be more satisfactory than mere conjecture from me, because I have not used them.

370. How was this list of consumers compiled; who sent out the petition they signed?—It was sent out under the direction in Birmingham of a friend of mine, who suggested that one of the best things to do was to ascertain the opinion of large consumers of files, seeing this was coming before the Committee.

371. This was sent out on your authority, in point of fact?—Yes, with my knowledge.

Chairman.

372. I have just one or two questions to put to you; as I understand it, you are promoting this Bill in the interest of the consumer and of the particular trade affected, the hand cutters?—Certainly.

373. Now, is it a fact that a machine-cut file may be made as well as a hand-cut one?—There are various qualities.

374. If you will just attend to my question it will shorten the matter very much; I want to know whether it is possible, and whether it is a trade fact that machine-made files are made as good as the best hand-cut files?—I do not think so.

375. Would you say that it is not?—I will leave that for the expert engineer to answer.

376. Then you cannot deny that it is so, as far as you are concerned?—I would not attempt to give an expert opinion as a user.

377. I thought you had been giving us a good deal of expert opinion?—Not as a user; I do not use a file.

378. Were you never a practical worker?—I have cut them.

379. I am speaking of making?—Yes.

380. You are therefore a judge of the manufacture?—Yes.

381. Then I ask you whether you have not in the trade ascertained that as good files are made by machinery as are made by hand?—As a matter of fact, our experience has been the other way.

382. Will you deny that there are any that are made as good as the other?—I could not deny that there are some machine files that are, perhaps, better than some badly-cut hand files.

383. I am not talking of badly-cut files; I am talking of the best of both; I may come to the badly-cut presently; I take the best of both; is it not possible to produce some of the one equal to the best of some of the other?—I will take this position; I do not think it is.

384. You do not think it is; now will you tell me why?—Because of the greater care bestowed in the preparation of the tool and the manipulation of it.

Chairman—continued.

385. That depends upon the care. Suppose the greatest care is bestowed upon the making of machine ones, cannot they attain the same excellence as the others?—Well, I have yet to learn that they can.

386. Would you deny that that is possible?—Yes; I should stand to the supremacy of the hand cut.

387. You will stand to it that you think so?—Yes.

388. It is quite possible to have very inferior hand-cut files, is it not?—Yes.

389. That depends upon the workmen, upon the material, upon the tools he is furnished with?—Yes.

390. Therefore there may be a considerable number of badly made hand-cut files, may there not?—Yes.

391. I suppose we may admit the same as regards the machine-cut file; there may be a good many badly-made machine-cut files in the market?—Yes.

392. Then the risks seem a little equal; the consumer may buy some very inferior hand-cut files and some very inferior machine-cut files?—Yes, of course; as they are in the market he may, certainly.

393. Now with regard to stamping: what is your objection to stamping your own work to show that it is better than anybody else's?—My objection?

394. Yes; you have been asked why should not you stamp the hand-cut files?—I am not aware that I personally object to the stamping of the hand-cut files.

395. I thought you said it put you under a disability?—Yes; but if you will allow me to proceed, I do believe that it is unfair to place any obligations upon persons who have not in any shape or form violated any principle, and leave other people to just do as they like.

396. But that is rather begging the question. You want to put it upon a number of file makers who have never violated anything, although they are the machine-made file makers?—Of course I want to describe the article, certainly.

397. Only to describe the article?—Certainly.

398. But then you say that you have a great objection to do that for yourself?—No, I did not say I had an objection to do it.

399. You said you objected to disability being put upon you?—We have never attempted to deceive, but others have.

400. I am pointing out to you that a number of honest makers of machine-made files have not attempted to deceive, yet you are going to include them in this Bill?—Yes, certainly.

401. That is rather hard, is it not. But does it not come after all, to a question of honesty; and do you know of any laws that will enact that honesty shall always be observed and shall always be detected?—It comes to a question of protecting the ignorant, and those that have not a practical knowledge of these things, from deception.

402. Do you mean that the buyers of files are ignorant, that they do not knew that if they give a low price they get an inferior article, and that if they give a high price and demand a guarantee with with it they can get it?—That is not how it is worked out; it is not worked out in that way.

403. I observe in one of the instances you give in support of the Bill that it was a case of machine-made files detected in Liverpool, stamped "hand-cut"?—Yes.

404. That was a distinct fraud, was it not?—It was.

405. How would that be altered by this Bill. A fraudulent man might put "hand-cut" upon files in spite of this Bill, might he not?—Those files were machine-cut, and if this Bill had been in operation he would have had to put that on them.

406. You assume that if this Bill were in operation he would be obliged to; but if he is a fraudulent man who evades the Act, you know, he puts what he likes on?—Yes.

407. Then how is it that your proposed Act is going to do such great wonders?—I do not know that I cited that except to show that deception was practised. I take it that if the Bill was carried into law there would be every reason to keep people on fair lines in trading, and there would not be that incentive to take orders at a cheaper rate, and push out manufacturers who were prepared to send the article into the market which was expected from them.

408. Take the case I am putting to you; there a manufacturer was so fraudulent, as you say, that he stamped the files as "hand-cut?—Yes.

409. That same man would in spite of this Bill of yours be just as likely to stamp them "hand-cut," and run his risk?—Possibly he might.

410. Then what does you law do to meet fraud?—On the general question it would certainly be a very great advantage.

411. Now, I observe that most of the files that I have seen bear the maker's name, is that so?—Most of them do.

412. Is not that a way of assuring the public that they are honest files, and of the nature which they are sold for?—We have cases where manufacturers of files are not always understood to employ machinery. In some cases machines are not fixed on the premises; they are outside, and no one knows that they have any machines. It has been a very common thing for visitors to go round works where they employ machinery in the manufacture of the files, and although they have shown them the hand-cutting portion of the work they have not shown them the machine-cutting portion of the work, and consequently they have gone away with the conviction that hand-cutting only was employed in that particular firm.

413. I think you must admit that there is a chance of having as fine and excellent files made from machinery as from hand; you say you rather doubt it, but you will not deny it; then if I contract to supply a number of files of the same quality, what does it matter whether they are machine-made or hand-made?—It does matter if it is a question of price.

414. And quality?—I mean to say that is in the case cited.

415. I should have to answer to the purchaser for my agreement or for my contract?—If it is a question of price (if 2½ to 5 per cent. is obtained with the understanding that they are hand-cut and you supply machine-cut) of course there comes in a difficulty.

416. If a man says, knowing it to be untrue, "This is hand-cut," then you can have at him in many shapes with the law as it is now; he has told you a lie by which he has obtained money; you can indict him for false pretences if he knows they are not hand-cut and he sells them as being so?—Yes, sir, but you know as a legal gentleman the great difficulty there always is in proving any cases of fraud of that character.

417. But how does this meet it; this does not carry it any further that I see; the difficulty of proof is the same whether he did know or did not know?—It would give greater confidence to the trade generally.

418. That, of course, is what we shall have to deal with and to give very proper attention to; now you say that some of the files may be too small to be marked; did I understand you so?—I said it was possible there might be some in the future.

419. Then why not except those in this Act; you are ordering a man to do an impossibility; in every case he is to mark every file and you admit that a considerable number cannot be marked?—No, I do not admit that so far as present manufacture is concerned. My experience so far as machine-cutting is concerned is that the files that are, down to the present time, cut by machinery can be marked.

420. But you cannot answer for all time, whether there will be smaller files, or what not?—No, none of us can.

421. Then you are enacting something in the dark which compels a state of things which a good subject will not be able to comply with altogether in that respect; that is a small matter?—That is a matter that could be dealt with in the Bill.

422. You have been asked about watches; you will observe that in the case of watches they professed to come from abroad here, and this Merchandise Marks Act generally deals with the use of some description upon the watch which was misleading to the purchaser, to make him think that the watches were made in the United Kingdom?—Yes.

423. That was to meet a positive fraud?—Yes, but I fail to see the difference between the one and the other; whether it is in the kingdom or outside the deception or fraud is the same thing.

424. To make it similar it would have to be the case of files, which, being made by machinery were marked and stamped "hand-cut"; that is exactly the case there, and your Bill does not touch that; with regard to margarine do you know that that was within the Adulteration of Food Act?—Yes.

425. Then it seems hardly so much to apply as a precedent here, but that is a matter of argument?—Certainly.

Mr. William Henry Senior, called in; and Examined.

Mr. Stuart-Wortley.

426. Do you belong to Sheffield?—Yes.

427. Are you president of the Hand File Cutters' Society?—I am.

428. Are you yourself a practical cutter by hand?—I am; I have cut files for 32 years.

429. Have you heard the whole of the evidence of Mr. Uttley?—Yes.

430. Do you concur with what he has said?—Principally I do.

431. Do you concur with what he has said as to the deception that is possible and that is practised in the file trade?—Yes.

432. Do you concur with what he has said as to the impossibility for anybody except trained experts to distinguish between a machine-cut and a hand-cut file?—Yes.

433. And as to the demoralising effect of these practices upon the trade generally, both to the producers and the users?—Yes.

434. Is there anything you wish to add to Mr. Uttley's evidence?—Only that I have had an opportunity which Mr. Uttley has not had, of going over a lot of these goods which were sent away from Sheffield to the various dockyards and the Government departments. I had an opportunity of looking over a stock of files which were sent as hand-cut files which were not hand-cut files, and there eliminating 2,950 dozen of files which had been sent by a firm in Sheffield to the Admiralty; I had that experience, and certainly could answer some questions which Mr. Uttley has not answered, probably to the satisfaction of some of the gentlemen around here.

435. At all events, you agree with regard to that case that it was not until experts had been turned on to these files that it could be discovered whether they had been cut by machine or by hand?—Yes, and I could give you some proofs of that particular case. At the commencement of those proceedings I was one of the people who were deputed to go to Portsmouth and see the files, and to convince the authorities at Portsmouth Dockyard that an imposition had been practised upon them. In our presence was the Admiral of the Portsmouth Dockyard, the examiner or inspector of this class of goods, and there in their presence, and before the Admiral of that dockyard, the people who should have known were not able to detect but what the files were really hand-cut files. They put before us in the presence of the Admiral a specimen of hand-cut files from another firm, and a specimen of machine-cut, and asked us to point out to them, in these various files, the difference betwixt them, and show how we could tell; and we did so to their satisfaction.

436. You went there by request of the Board of Trade, I think, or the Admiralty?—Yes. They had been supplied as hand-cut files, and I have the instructions here. If I am not out of order I would like to answer a question that was put to Mr. Uttley. Supposing two files were cut, one by hand and one by machinery, they should be exactly alike in breadth, depth, length, and so on. This is brought about through the different mode in which they are manufactured. I will try to make it very plain. If we had the things here which I could show, I think I could convince you. The machine has the file firm in its grip, or "boss," or whatever they like to call it; it only moves forwards. If it were cast in a mould it would not be as strong; it would be cast metal. In the case of a man who has the file in front of him, and can use his foot, and so work it, he leans his chisel in a certain position; it has more play. The consequence is that the tooth of the file produced by his chisel is a lot stronger on the bottom than on the top. It is broader at the bottom than on the top. That is brought about through the play I have spoken of in the hand of the man, which is not produced in the machine, because there it is fast; it has no play; it cannot go any further forward or backward. In the case of a man where his chisel is it has this play; that produces the broadness at the bottom and the sharpness at the top which compels it to be stronger than it would otherwise be if it was in the machine.

437. Is there anything further that you have say on that same point?—No.

438. Is there any other question asked of the previous witness to which you wish to refer?—No, I do not remember anything just now.

Mr. Scott Montagu.

439. I should just like to ask you this question; you heard the question I asked Mr. Uttley about these hand files clogging up. They do not clog up so fast as machine files. The reason of that is the reason you have just told us, is it not?—Yes.

440. That the bottom of the tooth on the files is wider in the hand-cut than in the machine-cut files, is it not?—Yes.

441. Therefore, when they are filing the hand-cut file does not get clogged up with the metal shaving so quickly as the machine-cut file; is not that so?—That is so.

442. Therefore the hand-cut files are preferred for that very reason?—Yes.

Chairman.

443. Do I understand that that is invariably the case?—Yes.

444. Invariably?—Yes.

445. I thought you said it depended upon the greater play and the shifting which might vary in the one and in the other?—The man has the chisel in his hand resting on the block, he feels the other with the hand; in the machine the file moves and can only go in that direction (describing).

446. But he does not use always the same force?—No, he regulates that.

447. He has not always the same tool?—No; but the man is responsible for these; he buys his own tools; the machine man does not.

448. I understand all that, but what I meant

to say was this: you answer me that it is "invariably" the same?—Yes.

449. I am suggesting to you that there must be a considerable amount of variety at times in the play, in the change of position, and the difficulties under which the particular workman is at the time, the special tools and so on, that is all?—It is in this way: a man would not get a class of file to cut like this until he was a competent man; he has to produce the regularities of a certain class of work before he can get it.

450. But you misunderstood me; there are different degrees of competency?—Certainly there are.

451. You told me it was invariably the same; that is what I quarrelled with for the moment?—It is like a boy in a standard, he gets lifted from one standard to another.

Mr. Jacks.

452. In giving that explanation which you kindly volunteered, I understood you to say that the superiority of the hand-cut file consisted in this, that the tooth when it was made by the hand was broader at the bottom than if made by the machine?—Broader at the bottom.

453. Yes; show me on this file?—This file is narrow here. This is what we call a flat-edge; it is exactly flat like the side is. The man strikes it here and makes it like that; he makes it so that it will glide one tooth against another; the man glides his chisel to that tooth and strikes it there; but before he can produce this length and breadth and depth he must have had at least seven years of practice; without that he could not produce a file like this.

454. That is very interesting, but not quite the question; you say there was a difference in the tooth?—Yes.

455. What is the difference?—The difference is that it is stronger.

456. Never mind how it is done; is it broader, is it a different shape?—It is a slightly different shape.

457. What is the difference?—The chisel in the machine is thicker on the edge than what the chisel is in the hand of the man.

458. It makes it a clumsier groove, does it, or does it make a broader groove?—I want to try to make it plain in the way you can understand me; I am only an ordinary working man. The difference is that the tooth upon this file produced by the hand is thicker at the bottom on account of the shifting of my hand, which causes the tool to lean like that (describing).

Mr. Charles Shaw.

459. One is more wedge-like than the other?—Take this one. The machine is more in that way, which causes it not to be so strong when the weight comes against it. In the case of the man it leans more that way; consequently it is thicker here and sharper here. Every stroke the man takes he can see; if the chisel has got wrong he stops at once, because if he went on he could not get paid for it. The reason he does not mark it is not his fault, it is the manufacturers'; but he could mark it; the man is only paid for cutting it, and must cut it.

Mr. Jacks.

460. I have only one question more to ask you and it is this: if the hand-cut groove is that shape and the machine-cut that shape; how is it that the difference cannot be detected by Government officers and Government experts?—Because the tooth is so small that an ordinary man cannot perceive it. There are two files here, one cut by machine the other by hand; I would like to point out which is which.

461. Then in that difference, the shape of the groove, consists the superiority of the hand-cut file?—Yes.

462. And that enables the hand-cut file to be longer lived than the machine-cut file?—In my opinion that is the true explanation of the question you asked Mr. Uttley.

Mr. Albert Bright.

463. The previous witness said that your union included both hand-cutters and machine-cutters, I think?—Yes.

464. Have the machine-cutters not a separate union?—They have.

465. Then how comes it that machine-cutters are in your union?—In this way: a man need not be a hand-cutter to be a machine file-cutter. There are not more than a dozen men who cut files by machinery that are members with us. These men have served their time to a particular trade. We could not have the machine-men in our union, because if they were to be out of employment through looking after the machines they could not cut a file by hand.

466. To qualify a man for your union then the machine file-cutter must also be a hand file-cutter?—Yes.

467. But I think the previous witness said there were more than a hundred machine cutters in your union?—No.

468. It is the same union as yours?—Yes; I said there were about a dozen, and Mr. Uttley said there were about a dozen.

469. He said there were a good many hand file cutters out of work, and that is the reason why this Bill originated, because they were out of work?—Yes, they want to get work.

470. They want to be protected against what they consider unfair competition; that is so, is it not?—Yes.

471. There are a lot of hand-cutters out of work, are there?—Yes, a lot of hand-cutters are out of work, and simply for this reason: you can quite understand it, when you see firms obtaining orders for hand-cut files and supplying machine-cut. The consequence is, that these men are driven out, they have no work to do; and we complain, and rightly complain, because this thing is done. The men are thrust out, and that is done by firms which have obtained a reputation for producing a good genuine article honestly and fairly; and in the cases we have quoted they have traded on that reputation; have sent machine-cut files, deceiving the consumers, and that results in our men not doing the work, because they cannot get it to do when it is done by the machines. But it is not fair to us to say, what is the proportion that we can prove. We have proved that nearly 3,000 machine-cut files have been sent away from one place which should have been hand-cut. It is like asking us how many people are carrying that out. We believe there are several carrying it out, and our men have to suffer.

472. You say the hand file-cutters are out of work?—Yes, some of them.

473. Are there machine file-cutters out of work?—That I could not answer. I am not in their union and do not know.

474. That is not your union?—No.

475. Are they out of work?—No, there are no men in our union who look after the machine that are really out of work. If they are not working a machine now, it is simply because the work was strange to them, or they did not like the work, and they have left it.

476. Mr. Uttley gave a reason, which did not seem a very good reason, why the machine-cutters were not asked to join with the hand-cutters in promoting this Bill. He said it was, I think, because they were afraid of losing their places, or something of that sort; but it did not seem to me that they should be in any more danger than the hand-cutters of losing their places?—The reason, in my opinion, why they were not asked to sign this petition was that they were getting up one on their own account to prevent this Bill becoming law; they probably thought that if people got to know what the files really were they would not have the machine-cut, but prefer the hand-cut.

477. The machine-cutters have been raising opposition?—Yes.

478. Can mechanics and engineers who use files detect whether they are using a machine-cut file or a hand-cut file?—An engineer or mechanic would certainly be better able to answer that question than me. We have to cut he file; we never use a file in the same manner that a mechanic or engineer does. If a man were to bring to me a file, and say, "Can you cut me one like it?" I could so cut it that there is no one round this table who could say which was which; I could so imitate it.

479. If the files are all marked "hand-cut" and "machine-cut," the mechanic could at once tell whether he was using a hand-cut or a machine-cut file?—Yes.

480. Whereas if they are not marked, he might not be able to arrive at that knowledge?—No.

481. There is no truth in the suspicion, is there, that your body desires to enable the men to be able to detect at once that they are using a machine-cut file, and out of sympathy with your union refuse to work the machine-cut files?—There are a number of men, who, if they had a chance, would work the machine to-day, and we have no antagonism or anything against them: all we want is that each article shall be marked plainly, simply what it is, so that the man who uses it shall know exactly what he is using, and buy that which suits his purpose best; then we are willing to say the thing is honest and fair, and we ask for no more.

482. Would not all your wishes be met by the hand-cut file manufacturers marking their files so?—Yes; if they would do it on both sides we should have no objection to do that.

483. Supposing the hand-cut file makers marked all theirs "hand-cut," that would provide for the whole thing, would it not, because it would be fraudulent for the others to mark theirs?—Yes. They say it would be throwing some work upon them which they are not entitled to have.

484. They want to throw the work on others?—Yes because the others are not dealing fairly.

485. You do not say that all others are not dealing fairly?—No, but we have proof that a good many men that are respected and looked up to are doing this. The particular firm which I have been referring to have supplied the Government for 30 years with files.

486. The cost of marking hand-cut files would be a very small matter, would it not?—Yes, either hand-cut or machine.

487. We have had evidence from Mr. Uttley that there is a firm making files which habitually stamps "machine-cut" on its files, and as it sells them at 2½ per cent. less than hand-cut files, we understand you may be pretty sure that it does not cost much to put that mark on?—No.

488. Why should not your friends put "hand-cut" on your files if it costs such a very small amount of money, and settle the matter at once without having the trouble of getting a Bill and coming to Parliament?—There is a firm that do put on "hand-cut" to protect themselves.

489. Why should not you all do it?—We are only workmen; they are not ours.

490. But workmen have a great deal of power nowadays, we know very well?—We could not put any name on a file given to us to cut, however much disposed we might be to do so, and however the file is cut.

491. Still, I should have thought that those for whom you work would be quite willing to put "hand-cut" on, would not they, if you were to make a point of it?—We have asked them. They say they do not wish to be bothered with it; they have been going on in an honest way, and they think it unfair.

492. There is a very large quantity of files in stock, is not there?—I could not say. You will have some managers here.

493. It is probable that there are many tons weight of files in stock, is it not?—I could not say; we do not see the warehouses.

494. Supposing there were, how would you propose under your Bill to deal with the stock of files already made and hardened?—They could be marked.

495. How could they be marked after being hardened?—They are done so.

496. They would have to soften them, would not they?—No; all files sold are tempered up to where you see that black mark (pointing to a file), and it could be put on where the soft part is. You could file this part with another file, here.

497. If it were tempered up here, there would be a danger of its breaking?—Yes, it is tempered up to where this mark is, and a mark could be put on there now just as well as at any other time, and this file is hardened.

Mr. SAMUEL CARTWRIGHT, called in; and Examined.

Mr. Stuart-Wortley.

498. ARE you a file cutter?—Yes.

499. At Sheffield?—Yes.

500. Are you a member of the File Cutters' Union?—Yes.

501. Are you also chairman of the independent committee formed to promote this legislation in those parts of Sheffield which are called Philadelphia and Walkley?—Yes.

502. Have you heard the evidence of the last two witnesses?—I have.

503. And do you concur generally with what they say?—Yes.

504. And do you agree that it is necessary to have a mark to enable an ordinary purchaser to distinguish a hand-cut file from a machine-cut file?—I do, indeed.

505. Do you believe that the Bill, if passed, will remove the incentive to fraud which now exists?—I do.

506. Do you believe it is the practice of manufacturers to mix up machine-cut files with the hand-cut?—It has been done.

507. And do those who use the machines always keep the machines on their own premises, or do they keep them away?—Some of them have them away; they will not have them on their own premises.

508. Have you anything to add to the evidence of the previous witnesses?—Only the fact that only experts (and in some instances, they could scarcely do it) can tell machine-cut from hand-cut, which proves the necessity of this distinctive mark for buyer and consumer. It is necessary to have something to guide them, and that condemned order that Mr. Senior has spoken of, of nearly 3,000 dozen of files passed by Government examiners, to us appears sufficient evidence that they should have a distinctive mark. In reference to some of the questions put, as to why we should not have "hand-cut," I personally, and those with whom I have been working, would be delighted to see hand-cut files marked "hand-cut."

509. You would not object to an amendment of this Bill, making it necessary that hand-cut files should be marked to the same extent as machine-cut?—Not at all.

510. Are you aware that my Bill of last year contained such a proposal?—It did.

Mr. Charles Shaw.

511. Would you have any objection to the position being reversed. It being an undoubted fact that there are more machine-cut files than hand-cut files, in the ratio of 75 to 25, would you have any objection to the 25 being marked and not the 75?—I should not have any objection at all, provided all hand-cuts were marked "hand-cuts." They would leave the others blank then, so long as there was a distinctive mark. That is all we require, a distinctive mark, so that the purchaser could know what he was buying.

Mr. Stuart-Wortley.

512. I think it fair to ask this question here. You say that is your personal opinion; you do not profess to speak for the opinion of your union?—That is my own personal opinion; I believe that would be accepted.

Chairman.

513. Would be accepted by the union?—I believe so.

Mr. Stuart-Wortley.

514. You believe so, but you do not say that you have authority on behalf of the union to say that?—Oh, no, not all.

515. I wish to make that clear?—I have no authority on behalf of the union to say that.

Mr. Jacks.

516. I should like to ask just one immaterial question. I asked Mr. Uttley, "Is a machine man and a hand-cut man admitted on the same conditions and treated in precisely the same way, in your union?" and he said "Yes." Now, I understand that a machine man, as a machine man, would not be admitted into your union?—I am not aware that he would, but as regards those things, Mr. Uttley is far better able to speak than myself, I not being one of the executive committee.

Mr. Hazell.

517. I think I understood that about 75 per cent. of the files are machine-made, and 25 per cent. hand-made?—I do not admit that.

518. Is it the other way round; I am not quite sure?—I do not admit that at all.

519. What is your impression of the number of machine-made and hand-made?—It is rather an awkward question. In numbers, I should say certainly there are more hand-cut files than machine-cut, seeing that a large quantity of small ones are done by hand. It depends on how you put it; whether you put it in value or number.

520. In value?—In value I should say the scale is pretty equal, so far as I am able to imagine.

521. I think in the hand-cut there are between 3,000 and 4,000 people employed, and in the machine-cut about 250?—Yes.

522. Yet, when you come to sell the files, the machine-made sell at 2½ per cent. less than the hand-made, and the cheapness applies chiefly to the larger sizes of files?—That is what I say; there are possibly about the same value of one as of the other, files principally of 10 inches and above are cut by machine; they do come lower, but they are principally 10 inches and above, which is the more costly file.

Mr. Albert Bright.

523. Do you know the number of people employed on hand-cut files?—In Sheffield?

524. Yes?—I can give you the number approximately; we have over 2,000.

Chairman.

525. You have 2,000 in Sheffield?—Yes, male and female, old and young.

Mr. Albert Bright.

526. Most files are cut in Sheffield, are they not?—It is the principal place for manufacturing files; they cut all over England, but nothing like Sheffield.

Mr. George Betts, called in; and Examined.

527. Are you a member of the executive of the File Cutters' Union?—Yes.

528. First, I will ask you generally, do you concur with the evidence of previous witnesses?—Generally, yes.

529. Can you give any evidence as the numbers of hand file-cutters in Sheffield and the district?—I should say it is about 2,000.

530. Have you any evidence to give as to the advertisements issued and the labels and wrappers sent out?—Yes, I have several labels here. I have likewise some advertisements. You have practically had most of these; it would be hardly necessary for me to go over the ground that has been gone over with regard to advertising through the "Ironmonger."

531. Those that you have there are practically the same as those we have had?—No, not all of them. In the first place, I should like, with your permission, to call your attention to this: last June I placed one label with Sir Courtenay Boyle; that belongs to a firm whose business has now passed from the original proprietor into the hands of another firm. I should like you to see that label. This label belongs to the same firm; it distinctly has an indication that their files are all hand-cut.

532. That would be an offence against the Merchandise Marks Act, would it not?—That is, provided they sent them out machine-cut.

533. Was this label "hand-cut" placed upon machine-cut files?—Oh, no; the firm that that mark belongs to now turn out both hand-cut and machine-cut.

534. Then do they put these labels upon all their files?—I could not say that.

535. What should you say as to the proposition that the hand-cut files should be marked equally with the machine-cut files?—Well, as a workman, I should have not the slightest hesitation. We have to mark them for nothing at most places. I have worked for over 40 years for one firm, and I have to mark the whole of my firm's; that is, put my master's name on, and do it for nothing.

536. What I mean is this: would you rather have this Bill applying to, and making it necessary to mark, both hand-cut and machine-cut files than have no Bill at all?—Yes; rather than have no Bill at all, I would.

537. At present you know it only makes it necessary to mark the machine-cut files?—I should prefer both to be marked rather than not have a Bill at all. There is one label here which I am at liberty to read. I should like to read it to you. It was given to me by the vice president of the Chamber of Commerce of Sheffield. He has given me full liberty to read it.

538. Is it his label?—Yes; this is what he sends out with every packet of goods.

539. It says: "All files manufactured by me are cut entirely by hand, thus ensuring that durability and sharpness of tooth which it is impossible to attain in machine-cut files." That shows, at all events, that there is one manufacturer who believes in the superiority of hand-cut files?—Yes, and that is the name of the firm, "William Hall."

Mr. Stuart-Wortley—continued.

540. And he gave you leave to read that label?—Yes. There is a label lodged with Sir Courtenay Boyle, a facsimile (handing in the same).

541. Mr. Stuart-Wortley has asked you whether, in the event of this Bill being amended, to include hand-made files, so that they must be marked as well as machine-made files, you would be satisfied; and I understood you to answer in the affirmative; that you would rather have such an amendment than no Bill at all?—Yes.

542. Would you be prepared to go a step further and say that the hand-cut only should be marked; I notice that in this Bill, as it at present stands, the word "hand-cut" is never mentioned from the first word of it to the last. Wherever the word "machine-cut" stands to-day, would you be prepared to have the words "hand-cut" substituted for the same through-out?—Substituted for "machine-cut"?

543. Yes; compelling all makers of hand-cut files to stamp on their goods "hand-cut," so that if anybody bought a hand-cut file he would know not only from practice in working that it was a good article, but would be also able to tell from the fact of its being stamped?—With the mark on?

544. Yes?—Yes, as a working man, I should accept it. But they are not the offenders, you know. The producers of hand-cut files are not those that have deceived the public.

545. But rather than have no Bill at all, you would be prepared to stamp your goods, and come under the law to that extent, that you must stamp your goods "hand-made"?—Yes, in the interest of the general public.

546. Then the other files would not be stamped at all; therefore, anybody who bought a file without any stamp on it might say, "No, it is not hand-made," if it failed to have a stamp upon it?—No, I do not agree with that.

547. Then you did not understand the question?—No.

548. Then you would not be prepared to accept a Bill of that character?—No.

549. You would rather let the law remain as it is?—Yes.

Mr. Scott Montagu.

550. Do you agree with the answer given to me by a previous witness (I think it was Mr. Senior) as to the superiority of the working of the hand-made files as against machine-made files?—Well, I hardly corroborate my colleagues on that point, if you would allow me to just give a word of explanation. They did not seem to me to make it thoroughly clear. Take small files: in the case of hand-cut small files (very small ones) that is so; but taking a mill-saw file (8 or 10-inch), I am under the impression that the two best specimens produced by either method may (that is, material all told) be something like equal; one would be something like equal to the other.

551. The

Mr. Scott Montagu—continued.

551. The best of each sort?—Yes, I mean the best samples of the two classes. I cannot see that the workman could alter the material on which the work was done.

552. No, I am not talking about that; I am talking of superiority. The question I asked Mr. Senior was this, whether it was not a fact (I have had experience myself of the fact) that the machine-made file clogs up more quickly, and the indents in it become filled with filings more quickly, than a hand-made file does, and that it does not last so long, its life is not so good?—Yes, I do agree in that; a hand-cut file "clears itself," to use our term.

553. I was putting it in the negative; I said it clogged up faster?—Yes.

554. The hand-cut file is a thing you can use longer than the machine-cut without giving it a thorough cleaning?—Yes; take those files I spoke of (using the technical term) as "mill-saw"; taking two first-class specimens of the two modes of production, I do not think you would find much difference; but the difference would be in favour of the hand-cut, and we ask (in the interest, we maintain, of humanity and fairness) that the consumer shall be the referee between us.

555. You simply ask it as a question of ethics, that the consumer should know what he is buying?—Just so.

556. And he can choose between the two?—Yes.

Mr. Jacks.

557. Referring to that label which you were good enough to show just now, where it says "all hand-made files," does that man make machine-made files, as well?—No.

558. I just want to ask you a question which I asked Mr. Uttley: you are a member of the executive committee yourself?—Yes.

559. I asked whether the machine-cut men enter your union on the same conditions as the hand-cut, or whether there was any difference made, and he said there was no difference made; Mr. Senior said that a machineman would not be admitted until he had learned hand-cutting, which was correct?—I believe that, as regards the men that are brought up to the trade, but that are not file-cutters, it is a fact that we have a resolution to the effect that we could not take them in as members of our society, but we are affiliated.

560. Those machine men that you have in your society are in your society not because they are machinemen, but because they have learned the trade of hand-cutting as well?—Yes, and prefer not to leave the trade; that is the point.

Mr. Hazell.

561. Messrs. Berry and Company petition in favour of the Bill, but there must be a great many other makers; those makers are silent, are they indifferent?—Well, I cannot answer the question further than this, that most manufacturers, seeing they have an organisation, work with their organisation.

562. You are a hand-file cutter yourself?—Yes.

563. Taking one week with another, how long does it take you to stamp your own files if you have to do it?—Well, I should (putting one week with another) do four gross a week, and it would take me, perhaps, an hour to stamp them. I should have to put two marks on them.

564. Two marks on the four gross in the hour?—Yes; I should be working fairly well to do it.

Mr. Heath.

565. How many gross, do you say?—Four gross.

Mr. Albert Bright.

566. That is very hard work, is it not?—Not very hard work; most of it is small work.

567. Very small files?—Yes.

568. Do you strike them on a lead bed?—No. Do you mean mark them on a lead bed?

569. No; I mean cut them?—Yes, in a lead bed.

570. Have you never suffered from lead?—Not from my trade, I think.

571. It is the case, is it not, that many people have suffered from particles of lead flying about?—Yes, they lose what they call the "use" of the thumb, that is the muscle, that is in some cases; but I am under the impression that it is through the bad sanitary conditions of the bad workshops we are compelled to work in; if we had better sanitary conditions, it would be better for us.

572. That is a well-known symptom of lead-poisoning, is it not, the dropping of the wrist; not anything else?—Oh, yes. We had an epidemic in which commercial men and others suffered, men who had never touched lead; scores of them were down with "dropped wrist."

573. And it would come from lead?—Yes, but that was through the water supply, not through file-cutting.

MR. HOPWOOD, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. JOHN GRAY, called in ; and Examined.

Mr. Stuart-Wortley.

574. You are connected with the Amalgamated Society of Engineers, are you not?—Yes.

575. In what capacity?—I am a member of the executive council.

576. You have in the exercise of your trade acquired a practical knowledge of the engineering trade, and other trades in which files are used?—I have worked practically at the trade for 53 years before I was appointed to the office I now hold.

577. You have necessarily become very closely acquainted with the use of the file as a tool?—Yes.

578. Have you formed certain views as to the merits of machine-cut and hand-cut files?—Yes. You must understand in my trade we make the machinery for file cutting; we also make machines to do away with files altogether; but so far as I know, all the machine-made files that have been made have only been an approximation towards the hand-cut file; they do not even come up to it, and they never can excel it unless there is a different metal used, or they are made with a different cut or a different depth. The best files that have been cut by machines are only an approximation to the hand-cut files.

579. That is your opinion?—Yes

580. You said you had been engaged upon making, I suppose, the parts of the machines for making machine-cut files?—I have not been personally ; my trade has been.

581. Your trade, at all events, is to that extent disinterested in this matter?—We would encourage everything connected with machinery.

582. Nevertheless, you are strongly of opinion that a hand-cut file is more efficient for engineering purposes than a machine-cut file?—Yes.

583. Have you formed any opinion as to the possibility of the ordinary consumer distinguishing between a machine-cut and a hand-cut file?—Yes. All my experience, and all the information I have got from all parties who have been connected with the trade is that they cannot see any reason why the files should not be marked. All that people want when they purchase a file is to know whether it is a machine or hand-cut file; and they can see no reason why there should be any objection, in any way, to their being marked.

Mr. Stuart-Wortley—continued.

584. My question was as to the ease or the difficulty with which ordinary consumers can distinguish for themselves between a hand-cut and a machine-cut file, without the assistance of a mark?—They cannot do it; some of the experts cannot tell the difference, I believe, because the machine-cut files come so near to the hand-cut files. But when an engineer takes the files to work with them, he sees how they wear. A workman who buys his own files, and a great number of workmen have to buy their own files, if he can get a file for 1*s.* that would do the same work as one for which he has to pay 15 pence, of course he would naturally take the file at 1*s.*; but he would rather pay 15 pence for one file that would do the work than have to buy two of the shilling files to do the same work.

585. They would take the higher-priced file if they could be assured they were getting a better article?—Yes, that is so.

586. Was your own experience gained in any particular branch of the engineering trade?—No. I have been connected with engineering, machine-making, tool-making, and millwrighting, in all the different branches, having started at the trade over 50 years ago; I have had to go through all the different branches, and have been at work in all the different branches.

Mr. Charles Shaw.

587. You say that not even an expert can tell the difference between machine-cut and hand-cut files?—I think so, they are so near.

588. The difference is only to be found in actual work?—Yes.

589. Is that in the longevity of the file, or in the nature of the work done by it?—Sometimes the one, and sometimes the other. If you were going to do a fine piece of filing work, and did not want any scratches in it, you would be most particular to have a hand-cut file; with a machine-cut file you are not so sure as to your fine scratches if it is fine work; you would not

scrape out the mark; but with a good hand-cut file you always know how to use it.

590. What do you attribute the non-scratching of the hand-file to; the hand-cut file is of necessity a more irregular article than the machine-cut file, is it not?—No, it is not more irregular. For some reason or other you cannot get the grip. It might be so with some of them. I do not say that all hand-cut files are of superior quality. But machine-made files give a sort of scrape, having a scratching edge. I cannot account for it, but it is so.

591. Are you speaking now of the smooths and dead smooths?—No, I mean not rough files, but a certain cut or a smooth, the smooth in particular.

Mr. Jacks.

592. You said that not even experts can tell the difference, so near do machine-cut files come to hand-cut files?—Quite so.

593. In your first reply to Mr. Stuart-Wortley you said that the best machine-cut files are only an approximation to hand-cut files?—I say so still, for doing the work.

594. You mean they are an approximation in doing the work, but not in appearance?—No, in doing the work. They look just as well as the other, but in doing the work they are only an approximation.

595. You said, in reply to Mr. Shaw, that the character of the file depended upon its longevity and the nature of the work?—Yes.

596. And that if you required to do work nicely, you would pick out a good hand-made file?—Quite so.

597. If you picked out a good machine-cut file, would it not do the work equally well?—Yes, it would do some sorts of work very well indeed.

598. Have you read the evidence given before this Committee on the last occasion?—No, but I was here.

599. I asked Mr. Uttley this, at Question 227: "What I want to know is, if the files are both the same, can you not say wherein consists the quality which makes the hand-cut file wear longer than the other. If you cannot tell us, just say so, and that finishes the matter"? That was my question, and Mr. Uttley's reply was: "If you suppose that the tooth is exactly the same, and is put on in the same way in every shape and form, and the material is the same, then those two files should, at all events, run pretty well together in wear." You agree with that?—Quite so.

Chairman.

600. Up to what date does your experience as a practical man come; are you still working?—Up to two and a-half years ago I have been working as a workman.

601. Have you studied whether there has been any improvement in the machinery for making machine-cut files since?—Not for machine-cut files; there have been improvements in different kinds of machinery, of course, but not in machinery for file cutting, that I know of.

602. Has your attention been turned to that, and have you investigated the fact whether that machinery has improved?—No; it would make no difference to me to know about the qualifications of what the machinery will do. The fact is that if we get them ordered or have to make them we carry out the order, but the nearer they come to replace hand-cut files and go into the market the better it is for us.

603. As they come nearer to the hand-cut files, the only other question to make them equal to hand-cut files is whether the steel or material is of the best sort, is it not?—We cannot go into that; we only go into the practical working of it.

604. We have to go into that question, because we want to see what is the superiority of hand-cut over machine-cut files?—Yes. You see they are made of steel, and, as my friend Mr. Councillor Uttley said, if two articles are alike in all the parts they will do exactly the same work; that is what I say. I say that people ought to know from the files being stamped the work they are suited for, so that they could buy an article suitable for the work they wanted to do.

605. I suppose some machine-made files will last a great deal longer than others, according to whether the material they are made of is soft or hard?—Yes; that is a matter that may vary with different manufacturers. One manufacturer may have a superior class of steel.

606. I am asking as to your experience; have you not found that all files vary very much in the length of time they will last?—I have known them vary, but not to a very great extent. Of course all hand-cut files are not equally good; they may be of different material.

607. The best of either sort do not often vary, do they?—No, they do not, that is what you can depend upon.

Mr. Stuart-Wortley.

608. You have given us you own opinion; can you give us to any extent, and if so, to what extent, the opinion of your fellow members of the Amalgamated Society of Engineers?—They would like to have the files marked. Our report last year shows that there are 77,304 members, all practical mechanics, using files in some shape or form, and I have had communications through working on machines in different trades, the brass trade, &c., and in those trades the men have to buy their own files as a rule; and of all those whom I have consulted or talked to none can show a reason why the files should not be stamped. All would prefer that they should be stamped; I have here our yearly report, which I will hand to you (handing in the same).

Chairman.

609. Would not that be met by marking the hand-made files?—No.

610. Why not?—You see there is a great deal of wasters in files; there are wasters both in hand-cut and machine-cut; and if you have not got them marked those files would come into the market as wasters, and that would be an injustice injustice to the machine-cut files that were not marked, because they would be called wasters.

611. Would that be met by marking both of them?—Yes.

612. That is to say, the hand-made files should be marked and the machine-made files should be marked?—Yes; they should be marked "machine-cut" and "hand-cut."

613. Would you like the Bill to pass in that form, requiring that both should be marked?—Quite so; that both should be marked.

614. Then why cannot those who desire it mark their files now?—I do not suppose there is anything to prevent them; I cannot give any reason why they should not.

615. Why should they not try it?—If you pass this Bill, providing that they have to mark them, they will all do so.

616. That would be for all files, or for one class of them?—Yes.

Sir James Joicey.

617. You said it would be an injustice to the manufacturers of machine-made files if they were not marked and hand-cut files were marked?—Yes, it would be an injustice to the machine-cut filers.

618. Would the markers of machine-made files have any objection to the hand-cutters marking their own files "hand-cut"?—Some would, and some would not; they would not like to see one manufacturer putting his files into the market marked, and the others not marked. I see an advertisement here by one man that the machine-cut file would do three times the work of the hand-cut file; that man would certainly put three marks upon his files; but that is an advertisement, and we know what advertisements are.

Chairman.

619. Is it not the fact that one or more firms do mark their files "hand-made"?—I have never seen one.

Sir James Joicey.

620. Do you not think that if it were a disadvantage to a machine-made file not to be marked, seeing that one competitor is always glad to get an advantage over another, it would be to the interest of the hand-cut files to be marked hand-cut?—The machine-cut files want to take the place of the hand-cut, and the hand-cut means to retain its supremacy if it can. And, in order to give fair play to each, it is a fair matter of equity that they should both be stamped, so that those who purchase them may know what they are buying.

621. I gather from your answers that it would be really an advantage to the hand-made file to be marked "hand-cut," because it would be a disadvantage to the machine-made files not to have any mark at all?—I cannot see it in that way.

622. That was the impression I gathered from your answer?—I cannot see why there should be any objection with those who have machine-cut files to stamp them, more especially if they can put them into the market more cheaply. I should say it would be to their interest more than the hand-cut file makers to have their files stamped.

623. Do you not think that the user of the file rather depends upon the quality of the files sent to him, and if he gets a bad set of files from any maker he is not likely to repeat his order; do you think he cares whether the file is machine or hand-cut if it is a good file for his purpose?—Individually that is so, but a great many of those who give orders for large numbers of files do not use them themselves, and a man is apt to get a file that will not do the work it is supposed to do; whereas if they were marked, if there were bad work shown, if the file were examined it would be proved whether it was really what was offered.

624. How do you account for the machine-cut files always increasing, as the hand-cut files are decreasing, which is the case, is it not?—I always maintain that the hand-cut file has retained its position, and the other is merely an approximation to it; the machine-made file keeps improving in quality, but it is only towards coming up to the quality of the hand-cut.

625. Is not the number of machine-made files increasing considerably?—No doubt.

626. And the same rate of increase is not shown in the hand-cut, is it?—I do not think it is, because as an article of inferior quality is put into the market it will take the place of the superior, and increase in quantity, but the quality of the best article always remains the same. I should illustrate that by this example: If you buy a pair of boots you cannot tell from the appearance whether they are hand-sewn or machine-made, but you can tell the difference when you wear them; and as long as you have the means you will always get hand-sewn.

627. I gather from an answer that you gave to Mr. Jacks that the best machine-cut was equal in quality to the best hand-cut, and practically in the best qualities of both there was little difference?—If that is the case, I have not seen it.

628. I gathered that that was so from your answer?—I should say, the greater the argument for having them stamped.

629. After all, I suppose the user of a file does not care whether it is hand-cut or machine-cut so long as it is really of good quality?—In many cases the articles have to be refused where they cannot do the work. I have no doubt in some cases a machine-cut file is just as good as a hand-cut file; I am not saying that the machine-cut file is not or could not be made practically useful; I am merely saying, that when you buy an article you ought to know what you are buying when the two come so near that you cannot tell the difference till you come to do the work. There is no use in a man losing an hour or two's work if he is sure he can gain it by having a mark on the file showing that it is the file he has been accustomed to get.

buy their own files, they buy them in threes or fours, or half dozens, as they do in some trades. A man likes to know that he will get an article he can work with.

631. My experience is that small buyers know the value of an article as well as anybody?—They would not like to be served with an inferior article.

Mr. Jacks.

632. I take it, from your very interesting replies, that you think both hand-cut files and machine-cut files ought to be stamped, and that you hold that opinion rather because it is right for a man to know what he is buying than because there is any difference in quality?—Quite so.

633. Referring to an answer you gave to the Chairman, let me ask you, can an experienced workman not tell the difference between a waster file and a good file?—He could tell the difference between a waster file and a good file.

634. I only asked that question in order to put a second question; if he can tell the difference between a waster file and a good file, where does the hardship come in to the machine-made files if the hand-cut files only are marked; you said to the Chairman that it would be a hardship on the machine-cut files if they were not stamped, because they would have to compete with the waster files, and that would be unjust to them; but seeing that a man can tell the difference between waster files and good files, that answer does not apply, does it?—The two being so near each other, and the machine-cut taking the place of the hand-cut, you would be putting an extra charge upon the hand-cut, and letting the machine-cut off, which would be an injustice.

Mr. Stuart-Wortley.

635. When you say a workman could tell the difference between a good file and a waster, do you mean that he could tell it without trying it?—What we would call a waster would be simply a file that was not straight or regularly cut.

636. He could tell it by looking at it, could he?—Yes.

Chairman.

637. You said that, inasmuch as these files would, under the supposition that we are making, be marked "hand-cut," they might deceive some people in that case?—Yes; there is such a thing as being deceived; there is not the least doubt about that. There is no perfection in mechanics yet.

Mr. WILLIAM BECKETT, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

638. WHAT is the name of your firm?—Alfred Beckett and Sons.

639. Where do they carry on business?—Green Lane, Sheffield.

640. What is your precise manufacture?—Steel, files, saws, and tools; general Sheffield tools.

641. Has your firm been long established in Sheffield?—For 50 years.

642. Have you any objection to the Bill before the House which we are now considering?—I have a very great objection to it.

643. Would you, in your own way, just slowly, so that we may ask you questions on the different points, put forward your objections to the Bill. What is your first objection?—I object to the files being marked in any way whatever, because the manufacturer spends the whole of his life in establishing a mark, and when that mark gets known to the general public, especially in a foreign country, people buying know the mark, and go upon that. A foreigner will put a file on one side because of the change of a single letter in the mark. I should object to a single letter being altered in my mark; the fact of a single addition of any description to a file might lead to its being rejected.

644. Does your answer assume you do mark all your files in some way now?—They are all marked with a brand.

645. With the brand of the maker?—Yes.

646. You object to any addition to that brand being made compulsory by law?—I do.

647. Can you give us shortly your reasoning upon that; would you tell us what inconvenience to the public or to yourselves it would introduce?—Firstly, as I said, it takes a lifetime to establish a mark and make it of value, and when that file, or whatever the tool may be, is sent abroad, where people do not understand English, in many instances, especially in the East, any change in the mark might lead to the article being rejected. Men, for instance, come down from the mountains or from the hills and count the letters that are on the article; they cannot read the words, but they count the letters. They want an article like the one they have had before with a brand or a little design on it with which they are familiar: and if you were to add more words it would mean that they would reject the article.

Chairman—continued.

648. You rely upon the reputation your tools get marked with your brand?—Yes, as far as my own firm are concerned; and that is what the whole of the Sheffield manufacturers rely upon. You will see our mark on these files which I will hand in (handing in the same).

649. I observe on one side of these files the name of the firm, "Beckett, Sheffield," and on the other side the word "Matchless," with an arrow drawn through the middle of a "B;" is that what you rely upon?—Yes.

650. You would object to add to that "Machine-made," because you say that detracts from the value of your old established trade mark?—Yes; if I go to sell that file to an engineer, I hand it over to him, and if he asks me whether it is a machine-cut file, or anything of that sort, I may simply say to him, "Take it and try it in any way you like against anybody else's, and I am quite satisfied to abide by the result"; but we produce it as we like.

Chairman—continued.

651. Is there any other general reason you have for objecting to this Bill?—I do not know of any.

652. You have not reasoned it out upon general grounds; that is how it particularly strikes you as a practical man making these things?—That is how it particularly strikes me, and I think the Merchandise Marks Act covers everything that is required in this case.

653. That is another reason you give; you conceive that the Merchandise Marks Act meets the difficulty of the case?—Yes.

654. I suppose you are aware that the Merchandise Marks Act only applies, so far as that special legislation is concerned, to something that is engraven or marked; it does not apply to a verbal contract in regard to the sale of a set of files?—No; I understand it as such.

655. What do you say as to the superiority of hand-cut over machine-cut files; is it, in your judgment, possible, and is it actually done, that a machine-made file is made equal to a hand-cut file?—Yes, certainly.

656. Would you say that the best of both are equal?—The best of both are equal.

657. In the practical grooving or rowing and in the test of time and use?—Yes, in the wearing. In the year 1885 we had a Workmen's Exhibition in Sheffield, when we had the late Duke of Clarence to open the Exhibition. Files were amongst the exhibits, and in the class of large files there was some little misunderstanding. One man said that his material was too hard and that he could have done his work better if he had had more regular material; another man had another objection; they had one small excuse after another. They were large files and involved heavy work. The Committee then offered a prize of 5*l.* for the best three files which were cut of a certain class of files; they did not specify how they were to be cut. It never entered into the imagination of any single member of the committee that machinery would have anything to do with it.

658. Do you mean that machinery would not be employed, or that the fact of machinery being employed was not material?—It was never thought of. There were 26 applications; 26 workmen were competing, and all the files were made in one place; all the material and the annealing was done in one place. The annealing is the softening of them to make them suitable to cut. They were made at our place and they were sent in. There were six judges; the workmen themselves appointed three and the committee of the exhibition appointed three; the committee appointed three file managers, the workmen appointed three workmen. The files produced were all tested and were all examined at the Cutlers' Hall, and no one knew or had the means of knowing who produced them because the envelopes were all sealed up until the judgment was given. The three workmen judges were unanimous as to which were the best three; two of the managers were on the side of the workmen and one manager did not give an opinion. When the envelopes were opened the only three files which had been on a machine at all were the three that had won.

659. Were they machine-cut?—They had been partly cut by machine; the only three that had been on a machine at all were the three that had won; and the workmen never found it out.

660. We hear it is not uncommon for a hand-cut file to be on one side cut by hand, and on the other side finished by machinery?—Oh, no. Originally, years ago, the machines did the over-cutting of the file, which is this cut (describing it on a file). That cut only opens the material; it does not do the work. It is the up-cut, which is this cut (describing it on a file) which forms the tooth. It was not, therefore, of so much importance that the over-cut should be right as the up-cut; but as machinery improved they got to do both the cuts right by machinery.

661. They are both done by machines now, are they?—They are both done by machines.

662. In your experience there is very little combination of machine-work with hand-cut work in the making of files?—There is not much now.

663. There was at one time, was there?—At one time: and perhaps there are machines in use in that way now, because people do not discard the machine; that is, having bought the machine they make it work.

664. Is it your opinion, then, that the objection raised by this Bill is connected with the objection to the use of machinery in the manufacture of saws, files, and so on?—I do not think it is so much the objection to machinery, as the hand-cutters will remain for many years with us, because we cannot be rid of them, and we do not want to be rid of them; but they are being gradually drawn to the other side, and the very best men of the hand-cutters are the men who are chosen to work by the other side.

665. By the "other side" you mean the machine-cutters?—Yes; if I put up a machine to-day, I should ask the best man I have as a hand-cutter to work that machine. It is a great saving to his health; it puts money in his pocket, and is a great advantage to me.

666. Does your firm manufacture both sorts, hand-made and machine-made?—Yes; a workman in cutting an 8-inch mill-saw file, to earn 25*s.* nett, lifts in the week 601 tons by his hand, and after doing that he cannot be in a position, at the end of the week, to spend the Sunday so comfortably as if he had been standing by a machine and seeing it do the work.

667. Is it your idea that the best protection for the public, as consumers, is to insist on a warranty that they are hand-cut files if they wish it?—No; my idea is that the best protection to the public is to buy of reputable people. I think that the brand is sufficient.

668. We have got two alternatives here: this Bill proposes that the file should be marked; you object to that?—Yes.

669. Do you say that the public has sufficient protection, and that if it chooses to take pains it can get hand-cut files or machine-made files according to the will of the consumer?—Yes, certainly it can. If this Bill was to pass we are at the mercy of these 77,000 practical engineers, and it is like marking it with the brand of Cain,

and if any one of those men desires to do a firm any harm, he simply says: "That is a bad file," and he spoils it. I do not mean to say that that would be done, but we are open to it.

670. Do you suggest that the hand-cut advocates have the thing in their own hands by marking their files as hand-cut?—Certainly.

671. I suppose you would admit that there is in the sale of these things occasionally fraud, as there is in most departments of trade?—If a man is a rogue no Act of Parliament can alter it.

672. Would the marking of the files, if it was forced upon you, involve cost?—Yes, it would involve a certain amount of cost and expense.

673. That would be an objection, I suppose, apart from your objection to the marking on the ground that it would interfere with the appearance of your established trade mark for the purposes of foreign trade?—Yes. Of course, I object to it so far as the cost is concerned; but I do not take that as the main objection, because that is as nothing in proportion to the damage it would do us. And as regards any gain that a high-class manufacturer would get by producing the files by machinery, he could gain twice as much by taking it out of the material; and there is nothing to alter that. But he does not do that for his reputation's sake.

674. Have you a practical knowledge of the effect of hand-cutting upon health; is it, or is it not, injurious to health to some extent?—It is injurious to health; but it is not so injurious as it was a few years ago.

675. Are there more precautions taken now to prevent its being injurious?—Yes; I think the workpeople themselves take more precaution than they formerly did.

676. Did the injury to health arise merely from handling the lead for the bed of the file, or whatever you call it?—The principal thing that I ever noticed was, not so much from the dust arising as from the people being so dirty in their habits. If a man had been working a day, his fingers would look as if they had been silver plated with the lead, and many men would eat their meals without washing their hands, and so consume the lead.

677. Like the rest of us, they are more careful than they used to be, I daresay?—Yes.

678. I will ask you this general question: Is there anything in your mind which you want specially to put before the Committee?—I want to point out that, so far as the workmen are concerned, all the people in the trade are trying to let them die slowly. If this Bill were to pass, it simply means sudden death; for we should be at once compelled to put down machinery to do work which has not been done at present in Sheffield, but which can be done quite well elsewhere. I have some little files here (producing them) which are made in America, and which I have seen made myself, and everything in them is done by machinery. There is not anything in our town to do that at present.

679. Is there much importation of files from abroad, or is it merely beginning?—I rather think there are many being imported; but if we keep to the front we are not afraid of competition. We have got to keep to the front.

680. As a matter of fact, you perhaps know that there are a good many files coming in. Do you know the firm of Wagstaffe, of Nottingham?—I do not know them.

681. They have written to say that they have a large quantity of files from abroad coming in unmarked, and that they would have to mark them. You do not know that firm?—No; Then I have here some machine-cut files; Swiss files (handing in some files). At present those could not be made in England at all.

Mr. Stuart-Wortley.

682. Why not?—Because we have no facilities, and never had, for it.

Mr. Albert Bright.

683. These are watchmakers' files, are they not?—Yes.

Chairman.

684. You have exhibited some very fine files from Switzerland, and some from America?—Yes.

685. Could you suggest in what way those could be marked with the words "hand-cut" or "machine-cut," seeing that they are so small?—Those small Swiss files could not be marked at all; it is an utter impossibility. I have only the maker's word that these Swiss files were machine-cut, but I have seen the American ones made.

686. You have seen the American ones made, but not the Swiss?—Yes.

Mr. Stuart-Wortley.

687. I understand these files which you produce are American files which you saw made by machinery?—They are Barnett's files, made at Philadelphia.

688. Were they made by Barnett at Philadelphia and sent to you by him?—They were not sent to me, but I have been through Barnett's place and seen them making them.

689. I do not quite understand for what purpose you put them before the Committee?—Because at the last meeting of the Committee I think it was stated that files were only made down to a certain size; and I say that it is not many years before we shall be compelled to make them like these; but we fight against it as long as we can. We keep the men as long as we possibly can. The interests of the masters and the men are so welded together we cannot work apart.

690. You put these files before the Committee to show the extremely small size to which the trade is gradually being brought?—Yes; in a short time we shall be compelled to make those small files.

691. You say these could not be marked?—These could be, but not the little Swiss ones I have handed in.

692. These little Swiss ones are sold on a card, are they not?—No; that is simply the way they were sent to me by the manufacturer, who was through our works, and I asked him to send me some.

693. Here they are upon a card?—That was to prevent their being broken in coming.

694. Would they not be sold on a card probably?—I should say not.

695. At this moment they are on a card, as we see?—Yes, they are sent on a bit of paper, so as to come through the post more conveniently.

696. That card or paper has the maker's name and place of origin upon it?—Yes.

697. Does not it suggest itself to you that these extremely small files, like other small articles of cutlery, are very conveniently sold upon a card?—I know nothing about that.

698. You are not disposed to say the contrary, are you?—I do not know anything about it.

699. You do not make these very small files yourself?—No.

700. It is the fact that small articles of cutlery are not only conveniently, but very frequently sold upon cards?—Yes.

701. And those cards have marks and descriptions upon them?—That I do not know.

702. Do you mean to say you do not know that?—I do not know anything about cutlery. I never buy anything on a card.

703. But in passing ordinary cutlers' shops you have seen such small articles on cards, have you not?—I have seen cards up in cutlers' shops.

704. You are aware, are you not, that those marks on the cards, if made untruly, are just as much offences against the Merchandise Marks Act as if they were marked upon the articles themselves?—I do not know anything about them.

705. You say that this proposed legislation would spoil your trade mark. Your mark "Beckett" with an arrow is a trade mark, or what we call in Sheffield a corporate mark?—Yes.

706. That is the property of your firm?—Yes.

707. It is not the property of your workmen?—No.

708. You are at liberty to put that trade mark upon any goods you sell, whether hand or machine-made?—Yes.

709. You are, under the present law, at liberty to change at your will the mode of manufacture of any goods upon which you put that mark?—Yes.

710. Even though that trade mark of yours gives no information whatever to the customer as to the mode of manufacture, you wish him to continue to have no such further information at all?—Certainly; that trade mark is the guarantee of the article.

711. Before the Merchandize Marks Act was made more stringent, was it not the complaint that manufacturers and distributors used to change at their will the mode of manufacture without changing the marks or any indication of the mode of manufacture?—I am sure I do not know.

712. Was not that of necessity the nature of the fraud against which further protection was sought?—I do not know. You are getting me out of my depth.

713. Surely you are acquainted with the local history of Sheffield, and know the matters that led up to the passing of the Act of 1887?—I do not know anything about it.

714. Do you wish us to believe that you are totally ignorant about it?—Yes, I do; because it is no use answering as to things upon which I am not perfectly clear.

715. I did not understand you to refer to this marking spoiling your trade mark, except in foreign, or even what I may call semi-barbarous, markets?—I am not speaking as to our trade mark in particular, but of the whole trade marks in Sheffield.

716. Your knowledge is apparently beginning to be rather wider spread?—What I mean is that any gentleman here could go and take a Sheffield mark, and have it handed over to him, although he knows nothing about the trade, and could get a good thing out of it.

717. What I understood you to say was that it would spoil your market in the estimation of customers who, like the Indians and Orientals, are obliged to count the actual number of letters upon the file to assure themselves they are getting the same article as usual?—Yes.

718. What proportion of your market does that, what I may call semi-barbarous, market amount to?—I do not know. There are firms in the town who do nothing but that class of trade which they send to the East.

719. Is it not the case that the ordinary British engineer is not so ill-instructed that he can do nothing better than count the letters on the file?—He does not do that.

720. I suppose he supplies a reasonably large proportion of the demand for your files, does he not?—Yes.

721. In fact, is not that the bulk of the trade?—Yes, in my own private trade it is so.

722. You profess great ignorance of the Merchandise Marks Act and its history; but you said just now that the Merchandise Marks Act provides for everything that can be reasonably required by customers in the way of protection; are you aware that the Merchandise Marks Act provides nothing in the way of enjoining that any mark at all should be placed by any man who does not wish to put any mark upon the files?—No. I spoke of the Merchandise Marks Act simply because I have noticed cases where people are prosecuted for fraud.

723. Can any prosecution take place under the Merchandise Marks Act where no mark is imposed?—I do not know.

724. It is in the belief that the Merchandise Marks Act supplies a remedy for every such case that you made the observation you did; did you make the remark in the belief that the prosecutions which you notice are sufficient to protect the customers in every way?—Yes.

725. You say that the best machine-cut files are equally as good as the best hand-cut?—Yes.

726. Have you any advertisements of your firm with you?—No.

727. Your firm does advertise, I suppose?—Not largely. We do not advertise much.

728. But

Mr. Stuart-Wortley—continued.

728. But you do advertise?—We do advertise.

729. Have you advertised in Australian papers?—No, I think not.

730. Never?—I do not think we ever did.

731. Let me put this to you: have you ever advertised in Australian papers that your hand-cut files are better than machine-cut?—I am not aware that we ever did. I think I can safely say, no.

732. Has your firm acquired the business of an old-established firm which had won a reputation for hand-cut files?—Yes; Thomas Jowitt and Sons.

733. Supposing you received a large order for hand-cut files, you are of opinion, as I understand, that machine-cut are just as good?—Yes.

734. That being so, should you consider that it was right to supply machine-cut when hand-cut had been ordered?—No; and I should not supply them.

735. You would not do it?—No.

736. Supposing a customer goes to a retail shopkeeper, and wants to get hand-cut files, how is he to tell whether they are hand-cut or not unless there is a mark upon them?—He cannot tell. There is no need for him to tell. He does not want to know. What does it matter to him if he gets the article that he wants?

737. I am supposing that he wants a hand-cut file; you say he cannot tell?—He cannot tell.

738. Do you go so far as to say that machine-cut files are better than hand-cut files?—No.

739. As to those files cut at the Exhibition of 1885, is it not the fact that the machine-cut files, or those which were given the prize as machine-cut files, were, in fact, gone over again by hand as the last finishing touch?—I cannot tell that. I said they were partly machine-cut. I happened to be secretary to that committee at the time, and it was from a row that the workmen had amongst themselves that I knew they were machine-cut.

740. I thought you said they were made at your place?—Yes; but they were not cut there. They were made at our place, and the annealing was done there in order to get all the material alike. The material was all alike, the forging and grinding was all alike, and each man had them given out to him, and he cut them in any way he liked. Then they were brought back to the Cutlers' Hall, and the workmen appointed three workmen as judges and the manufacturers' committee appointed three managers. The judges appointed by the workmen were unanimous as to which were the best, but no one knew that machinery had anything to do with it.

741. The three files adjudged to be the best were files which, though partly made by machinery, had been finally gone over by hand and finished by hand; was not that so?—I should say that was it.

742. At any rate you are not in a position to say that my information upon that fact is incorrect?—No. I know they were partly done each way.

743. You say that if this Bill passes you will be at the mercy of 77,000 engineers, any one of whom might point to the mark "machine-made" and say that the file was no use?—Yes.

Mr. Stuart-Wortley—continued.

744. Cannot he do that at the present moment with respect to your trade mark, supposing that he has a grudge against your firm?—Yes, but that is a grudge against a private firm, whereas if the file were marked "Machine-cut" it would apply to anybody.

745. Do you suggest that a man is likely to have such a grudge?—No, I do not.

746. What motive can you suggest he should have?—I cannot suggest any motive.

747. Is not a motive against the machine-cutting trade as a whole less likely than a motive against any particular firm?—Yes.

748. Are not the engineers of the Amalgamated Society interested in promoting the manufacture of machine-cut files?—They should be.

749. As to the cost, what should you put the cost of marking the files at?—I should not take it into consideration at all.

750. How are these very small files sold; are they sold in parcels or put on to a card. I mean the very smallest you make. What are the smallest you make?—Down to about two inches long.

751. In what form do you sell them; do you sell them in boxes or in parcels?—In small parcels.

752. The parcels are labelled in some way, I suppose?—Yes.

753. Are they sold by number or by weight?—By number; by dozens.

754. Each parcel containing a certain number?—Yes, according to what the customer requires.

755. And the label indicates, I suppose, what number is inside the parcel?—Yes, one of the labels, the description label, would do so.

756. There is a description label, is there?—There is a description label on them.

757. Then, at all events, the mark "hand-cut" or "machine-cut" could go on that label?—Yes.

758. Have you any other reason why you object to marking a machine-cut file "machine-cut," except the possible depreciation of the value of your trade mark?—I have the general objection: Why should we be saddled with this marking when no other trade in the kingdom is.

759. That is not the case, is it; there is margarine, for instance. You cannot say that now, can you?—Margarine is not a manufactured article, is it.

760. What is it?—Possibly it may be a manufactured article; but it is not hardware.

761. It is a manufactured article, is it not?—I do not know anything about margarine.

762. Do you think that if machine-cut files were so marked, or even if both kinds of files were marked, it would give the hand-cut file an advantage in the market?—It would not have anything to do with it if the man tried the quality.

763. We have to consider what happens before the man tries it; that is, when he actually buys it across the counter or otherwise, and before he has a chance of trying it?—Neither of them would have any advantage.

Mr. Stuart-Wortley—continued.

764. Would they think they had an advantage. I want to get at your opinion as to what would be the effect upon a customer's mind in buying his files; if he saw two files upon the counter, one marked "hand-cut" and the other "machine-cut," which would he be most likely to take?—He would never look unless some one had prejudiced him in favour of the one or the other; he would not know anything about it, and he would not want to know.

765. Do you mean to say that after the evidence of Mr. Gray, although he might be a skilled engineer he would not want to know which it was?—He would not.

766. Then you disagree with the evidence of Mr. Gray?—In that respect, I do.

Mr. Charles Shaw.

767. I undestand your objection to additional words being put on the files concerns the foreign trade only, practically?—No, it concerns the home trade quite as much.

768. I take it by the "home trade" you mean where you sell to export merchants?—No, I mean where we sell to engineers here.

769. They would not be misled by the term "machine-made" being marked on the file; they would not think it was a different article to that which they had been buying before, would they?—If it was marked in any way, anybody would be open to be persuaded or to be prejudiced against it. Now a man gets an honest article and he tries it on its merits; and if it is not right he does not buy any more.

770. Do you mean that the oldest engineers, who have been accustomed to have hand-made files, might be prejudiced, and if the work that is turned out is scamped by the workman or not of a good quality, if there is any fault to be found, the blame would not be thrown upon the workman, but would be thrown upon the file, if it was marked "machine-made"?—Yes, if it was marked anything.

771. That is the explanation of the terms you used when you said you would be in the hands of the 77,000 engineers?—Yes.

772. Is it not the fact that, in the case of the files you send to India, the brass workers in Delhi, and other great cities in India, when they come to buy the files, generally bring down a tracing of the mark of the last files they bought?—I cannot say positively that it is the fact, but it was so reported in a trades mark case some time ago.

773. At all events, they have the very strongest objections to buy any file that does not appear to be exactly the same as the file they last had?—Yes.

774. You say that the additional cost of adding these words is very small; do I understand you to mean it would not be appreciable in the manufacture?—It would be appreciable in the manufacture, but it is not the cost that I am basing my objection upon, it is the principle.

775. And do I gather that the difficulty of want of room is not a serious one?—In the case of many of the files it is not.

776. On all the larger sizes there would not be any difficulty; but it is when you come down to the smaller sizes?—Yes.

777. And it would become a serious difficulty if you took up the manufacture of the smaller files in competing with other countries in the small class of file not at present produced in England?—Yes, it would be a very serious difficulty in that case.

778. There is a difference of cost, is there not, between hand and machine-cut files?—Yes.

779. That difference is shown in the discount, is it not?—Yes.

780. I do not wish to ask what the exact difference is, because that is rather a trade question, but that difference would be appreciable to anybody who ordered the one or the other; he would know by the discount which it was, would he not?—No, he would not, because we can barely get a living out of it as it is, and it is worked so that there is not a penny to choose between the cost of the one and of the other. The man who has to produce them by hand does not get the same amount out of them, but it is very nearly the same. They are all down to the same price very nearly now.

781. If I ordered one hundred dozen "bastards," we will say, by way of argument, I presume you would only supply hand cut if I specified such?—Yes, only if you specified it.

782. Otherwise you would supply machine-cut files?—Otherwise I should supply machine-cut.

783. You would do so on two grounds, I presume; the first being that the cost would be the same, and the second being that the article was equally good?—Yes.

784. Have you ever had complaints from any part of the world that files which you have supplied should have been supplied hand-made, although the buyers had not specified such?—Never.

785. If you supplied machine-made files when hand-cut were specified, are you not already amenable by the present law?—Yes, I imagine so.

786. That, I take it, was the real meaning of your reply to the Chairman when he mentioned the Merchandise Marks Act?—Yes.

Mr. Jacks.

787. You gave your first reply to the Chairman so rapidly that I did not quite catch it; you said that your firm manufactured steel, files, and other things; I take it, of course, you meant steel and files?—Yes.

788. That is, you make your own steel?—Yes.

789. Your chief objection to marking the files in this way is that it takes you so long a time to establish a trade mark, and that putting the proposed mark upon the file would interfere with the value of your trade mark; you also said it would have some effect with the home engineers, with the home market?—It is open to have that effect.

790. Do you mean to say it would have that prejudicial effect with the home trade if you put, I will not say after your trade mark, but after the words "warranted cast steel," the words "machine

"machine-made," the engineers all knowing that a Bill had been passed requiring that mark to be put on?—It is only that a dishonest man might take advantage of it.

791. Therefore it is only to the foreign market that your chief objection applies practically?—I object to it strongly as regards the engineers.

792. I did not ask whether you objected; but your objection applies to the foreign market practically?—Yes, it applies to the foreign market.

793. You do not send any files now, as a matter of fact, do you, nor have you done so within the last 12 months, to Germany?—We do not send any at all to Germany.

794. The bulk of your firm's orders, or of firms that you know about, will go chiefly to the Colonies and the East?—Yes. We send a good many files to Russia. Supposing we send files to Russia, and have to mark them "machine-cut," and a German has not to mark his files "machine-cut," what position are we in then? A German may go and send his files in without any mark on, and he may run down our file.

795. I was coming to that point. In reply to a question put by Mr. Stuart-Wortley, you led the Committee, or, at least, you led me to believe that the placing of an additional word or two words to your trade-mark here would have an ill influence upon your trade among semi-barbarous people, as Mr. Stuart-Wortley called them?—Yes.

796. The Russian workmen do not know our alphabet, do they?—No.

797. You know that they have an absolutely different alphabet?—Yes.

798. Then that observation would apply to them as well?—Yes.

799. Do you send any files to Canada?—Yes, from Thomas Jowitt & Sons, which is practically the same.

799*. Quite so; I mean the trade when I say "you?"—Yes.

800. Are you aware that the Canadian workmen who are intelligent, and do know English, are as particular about the mark as the semi-barbarous people are?—I do not know that.

801. Do you know of any instance where a large quantity of tools was refused in Canada; at Kingston, to bring it nearer (I will not mention any names), because there had been an alteration in the name of the firm?—I was not aware of that.

802. You said, in reply to a question from the Chairman, that the best of both kinds of files were equal?—Yes, I think that is so.

803. That bears out what the other witnesses said, but Mr. Uttley said that one of the causes of defective hand-made files was that under certain conditions there was a great temptation to the hand-maker of files to scamp his work. I am not asking whether that is true or not, but I am only quoting the evidence. Now, when a man is making a file by machinery if he fits the tool properly into the cutting, can he scamp the work; can the tool scamp the work?—If the tool is not properly whetted.

804. I am assuming that the tool is properly set going, and kept going?—If the tool is in perfect order he cannot scamp the work.

Mr. Jacks—continued.

805. So that to that degree manufacture by machinery is safer?—Yes.

806. Then there was the extraordinary case of the prize files to which you referred, and which I did not quite follow. I understood you to say that, owing to a dispute amongst the workmen themselves, the Committee decided to have some prize files made?—Yes.

807. And there were 26 applications made?—Yes.

808. Do we understand that there were 26 applications made to compete?—Each man had three files; there were 26 men, and each cut three files.

809. So that there were 78 files altogether?—Yes.

810. How many files got a prize, three or one?—Three.

811. So that there were 75 files that got no prize?—I will not be sure whether there was not a sovereign for the second prize, or something of that kind; but one man got the 5*l.*

812. Those three files which got the prize were made partly by hand, and partly by machinery?—Yes.

813. How were the other 75 made?—They were all cut by hand.

814. Every one of them?—Every one of them.

815. Then, those three that were partly done by machinery were the only three that were not exclusively hand-made?—Yes, that were not exclusively hand-cut.

816. You know that of your own knowledge?—Yes, because we arranged that the files were to be sent to the Weston Park Museum, but they were never sent.

Mr. Albert Bright.

817. Why were they not sent?—Because of the prejudice that was created against them.

Mr. Jacks.

818. The prize was given because they were better in appearance, I suppose?—I am not a sufficiently good file-cutter to say how the judges decided.

819. When they came to work do you wish the Committee to understand that those three prize files would wear better?—They were never tried; they were cut for the exhibition, and were never used.

820. Were they made for ornament?—They were to be sent to the museum.

821. Passing to the next point, in reply to the Chairman, you said that if you were putting up a new file-making machine you would take the very best hand-cutters for it?—The very best I could find.

822. Why?—Because the art of cutting a file is knowing how to whet the chisel; it is not hitting at it, you must have a practical file cutter to whet the chisel, and if a man can whet the chisel right the machine will do the work.

823. You also said that one of the reasons why you would take this good man would be that it would be better for his health?—That was not one of the reasons; I only mentioned that.

824. Incidentally you added that because he had to lift 600 tons a week?—Yes, that is what he has to do as a hand-cutter; so that you see he is always knocking at the door to get on to the machine.

825. You do not mean to tell the Committee that the man is any the worse for lifting 600 tons in a week, do you?—I do tell the Committee he is worse.

826. Would not you think he was better and stronger for it; however we will not go into that. In reply to the Chairman you said (I am not using your exact words, but I think you will agree I am giving the effect of them) that the best guarantee that man can have that he is getting a good article is the character of the firm, and if he bought from reputable people he was all right?—Yes.

827. Old firms die out, of course; what would you say about the really honest capable men beginning trade?—There is as good a time for them as ever there was.

828. Their name offers no guarantee to the public?—No.

829. How do you get over that difficulty?—They have to begin in a small way; they have to find their customers and persuade them that their goods are all right; they have to live a lifetime to get before the public.

830. So far as they are concerned the guarantee you referred to, in reply to the Chairman, would not exist?—No, because they have not established it.

831. I gather that you do not know anything about the importation of files?—No.

832. You do not know that they are being imported from Germany?—I do not know it of my own knowledge. I hear they are imported.

833. Then you referred to the American and Swiss files; you saw those made?—Yes, I saw them.

834. You have not seen them made in Switzerland?—No.

835. You have no reason to doubt the gentleman's word who told you?—No, the gentleman sent them to me.

836. You may take it is perfectly correct; I have seen them made. You stated you did not know whether they were sold on cards or parcels, or boxes?—No.

837. Would it occur to you that they would do exactly what you have explained; put them into parcels or boxes according to the nature of the order?—Yes.

838. You think that is reasonable?—Yes, according to the requirements of the customer.

839. And when I tell you that for large orders they do that, and that for small orders they put them in parcels, you would not be prepared to contradict that?—No.

840. My friend on the left asked you, if you got an order for a certain number of files without any stipulation that they were hand-cut or machine-cut, would you give them machine-cut; and you said "yes," and you gave two reasons for doing it. Is not there a third one, that you could deliver a large order quicker?—Yes, that would be so.

841. Then you are not prepared to say that the importation of files from America and Germany and Switzerland, and I think Belgium, is, or is not, increasing?—No, I do not know anything about it.

Mr. Jacks—continued.

842. But do you think that the effect of manufacturing files by machinery, seeing that you can make so many more than by hand, would be to assist the British maker of files to compete with foreigners?—Certainly.

Mr. Pierpoint.

843. As regards the competition between the hand-made files and the machine-made files, solely the competition between those two, should you have any objection if each sort was marked with its own character?—Do you mean simply now as far as comparing one with the other is concerned?

844. Competition solely between hand-made files and machine-made files?—No, I should not, not for the competition, only I should object to it because I do not want the mark on anything.

845. I just want to ask you about the whetting of the chisel. If the whetting of the chisel is the sole matter of skill in the file-cutter when he is making machine-made files, could he not scamp his work?—Do you mean if he did not whet it properly?

846. Yes?—Well, yes, he could if he did not whet it properly, but then that would be discovered in the warehouse.

847. After the file was made?—Yes.

848. But the same thing would apply, would it not, to hand-cut files, that would be discovered in the warehouse?—Discovered in the warehouse; well, he would not be paid for them.

849. I merely wanted to ask you whether scamping is not possible in machine-made work equally as in hand-made?—Certainly, if a man is disposed to do wrong you cannot make him do right, you know.

850. It is not absolutely certain that the machine will turn out an article that is perfect, unless the man whets his chisel properly?—No.

Mr. Albert Bright.

851. You said good hand file cutters were preferred to work on file-cutting machines, men who had had experience?—Yes.

852. Is that entirely on account of their better knowledge of how to sharpen the chisels?—That would be my reason.

853. Would it not also be because, having experience in hand-file cutting, they would be better able to tell when the machine was doing its work properly from looking at the files that were being cut; they would see they were properly cut?—The fact of the whetting of the chisel, that is really the matter that determines whether the file is cut right.

854. If the chisel is properly whetted of course the force of the blows given by the file-cutting machine is uniform?—Yes.

855. It cannot fail to make an equally deep and equally clean cut each time?—If it was not for the whetting of the chisel, I should much prefer a mechanic to work the machine, because he knows about it. The file-cutter knows nothing except the actual file itself.

856. He would be able from his previous experience, would he not, to see that the file is being properly and sharply cut?—Yes.

857. You

Mr. Albert Bright—continued.

857. You were asked a question about these very small files as to whether they would not be marked on the card in this manner, like the trade mark which is put on this card, to distinguish them from hand-cut files. Do you think that that would have any practical effect in securing that they should be hand-cut files if the mark were put merely on the card, and not on the file itself?—I do not know.

858. I mean to say this: it would be perfectly easy for any man buying these files from abroad to take them off the card and put them into a separate packet, and put no mark whatever on them?—Yes, it would.

859. Therefore, do you think that this would be an equally good safeguard against deception of that sort with a mark on the file itself; would not this be practically useless in securing that the file should be hand-cut?—Yes, it would be practically useless as far as that is concerned, because you have only to take it off, and then anybody knows about it.

Chairman.

860. Are you aware that the Bill only provides that it shall be marked legibly, and in a manner reasonably sufficient for the information of any purchaser, with words stamped upon the shoulder or tang of the file, or upon any part of the file upon which it may be customary to place the manufacturer's mark or any other mark, and indicating that such file has been cut by machinery, or partly by machinery, as the case may be. The Bill therefore proposes at present to limit it entirely to marking the file; though, of course, there might be an amendment introduced. Now is it at all possible to mark anything on such small files as these?—No, it is not.

Mr. Albert Bright.

861. Then, in that case, it is impossible to protect hand-marked files as against machine-marked files when they are all of this small size?—Certainly.

862. Is it possible to put any mark on such files as those saw-sharpening files that were handed round?—Yes, you could.

863. But on that size of a file would it be a matter of difficulty?—There are five files there; and I should not put any mark at all on that little round file.

864. If you were making them?—If I were making them I should not put our own brand on, because it would damage the tang more than the good it would do. Then, too, it would go on in the general order, and, as it would be in good company, they would imagine it was a right one.

865. But, practically speaking, on even that size of file there would be a considerable difficulty in putting, not only either "hand-made" or "machine-made," but a difficulty in putting any mark whatever?—Any mark whatever.

866. You were asked questions about machine-cutting of files, and as to the scamping of them. May I ask you whether it is more easy to make a file look well to sell (that is, a showy file, but not a substantially good one) by machine than by hand?—I cannot tell you. You see a file is the most expensive article that goes into a machine shop, because its life is so short. Therefore, it is no use sending anyone a bad one, because if you make it only for show it will not wear.

867. We know in some trades that people do attempt to sell showy articles that look as good as better, and are really not so good. How is it more easy to cut a file by machinery on inferior metal so as to look well than it is to do it by hand?—I cannot imagine such a case.

868. What is your opinion of the real motive which underlies the application for this Bill?—It is to protect one industry at the expense of the other. I may say, as far as the hand-file cutters are concerned, they are of valuable assistance to us, and will be for many years, I hope; but they tried to bring in this Bill, and they got up a petition, and I have no doubt the machine-file cutters, who are equally as good, have signed another long petition against it.

869. Do you mean a petition signed by various firms?—By the workmen themselves.

870. We have had a long series of firms. But you say there were two petitions, one for and one against?—Yes.

871. Was the petition for the Bill that you allude to, a petition signed by a large number of users of files?—The petition I was referring to then was signed by only workmen, and there was another petition signed against the Bill by the machine workmen. One of the workmen, a very valuable man, too, who signed that first petition, I asked, for my own information, about it; and he said he wanted it because he had three lads, and those lads were 18, 19, and 20 years of age, and he had no work for them; and he thought it would put more work in their way if there were not so many machines. I said: "Suppose that I said to you, 'I will engage one of your lads to come over to the machine,' would you come over to the other side"? and he at once said "Yes," because his interest would lie on the other side then.

872. Supposing this Bill were passed, can you conceive that it would be of any advantage to the hand-file cutters, unless some arrangement or collusion existed between them and the users of files (I mean the working men who use them) to give a preference to one class of file over the other?—I cannot see that it would be of the slightest advantage to them.

873. When were files first machine-cut?—I do not know; but I have known them made more or less for the last 30 years.

874. Do you know where the first machine-cut files in England were made?—As far as my knowledge is concerned, it would be when Allanson had a patent file company at Smethwick.

875. Are you not acquainted with a file-making company at Manchester, or have you ever heard of it?—Yes; the British Patent Hardware Company.

876. That was more than 30 years ago, I think?—Yes, it is somewhere about that time.

877. Do you know why the making of those files by that Company was discontinued?—I should imagine at that time it was the prejudice of trade unionism against machinery.

878. You

Mr. Albert Bright—continued.

878. You have not any special knowledge or recollection on that point, have you?—No.

879. Do you know whether the files that were made were good; did you ever see any of them?—Yes; I have seen many of them. They were not the saleable file that we sell now. You see the machinery was in its infancy, and the people who were connected with it appeared to be engineers, and they made the files true, and in the cutting them made them true; but they had not the wearing properties that the files would have had if they had been cut by file-cutters.

880. But you have an idea that the reason why the business was given up was principally because the hand-file cutters and the mechanics were friendly to each other, and that the mechanics refused to use the files?—At that time, yes.

881. Do not you think there is a great danger that something of the same sort might occur if this Bill was passed?—I do not. I do not go so far as to think so ill of the men as that; but it is quite open that the file manufacturer is at the mercy of 77,000 men, any one of whom decides against a file, and it is marked "machine-cut," could spoil your connection, or do you serious injury. I do not for one moment imagine they would; but it is possible.

882. You say that if, in addition to the trade mark on the file, words were added to show that it was machine-made, people who do not understand English would consider that an alteration of the trade mark, and that it would be prejudicial to the sale of files?—Yes.

883. Would your objection on that point be met if all files were marked either "hand-cut" or "machine-cut"?—No, it would not.

884. You think then that the hand-cut files would be equally prejudiced with machine-cut by the additional words, and that, therefore, there would be further competition against both?—Yes, I think any addition to the mark would be detrimental.

885. You consider then, if this Bill is passed, it should be as obligatory upon the hand-cut file makers to publish their description, as it will be obligatory on the machine-cut makers to mark theirs?—I had not thought of it at all in that light.

886. But I understand you to say that if the two were equally treated in that way that would remove the disadvantage in foreign countries?—No; I do not say so. I say that any addition to your mark is detrimental to the sale of the article.

887. Is there any possible advantage to a workman who is working a file-cutting machine from scamping his work. Does he get any advantage at the time by doing that. Can he cut any more files in a given time?—Well, if he cut more they would not be passed. He would get no advantage, because his work would be rejected.

888. But it is possible that it may be of advantage to a man in cutting hand-cut files to give a slightly too light a blow or to cut them very quickly, so as to get more done in a given time?—When the work comes from the workman it is examined in the warehouse; and if he has not done his duty he is not paid for it. It does not matter whether it is done by machinery or by hand.

889. Is it not possible for a hand-cutting man to get through his work more quickly if he does not do it quite perfectly?—Yes.

890. While it is not possible for a machine-cutter to get through his work any more quickly, is it?—Yes; because he might leave his chisel thicker on the edge and do more files without repairing.

891. He would thus gain some of the time that he ought to have spent in repairing?—Yes.

892. But there is no more temptation to a machine-file cutter to do his work imperfectly than there is to a hand cutter?—No.

893. And it is just as probable that a machine-cut file will be perfectly made as a hand-cut file?—Yes.

894. Why was it you said that those files which were considered the best were not sent to that museum?—Because there was such an uproar about them. The workmen all thought, and everybody else thought, they had all been produced by hand; and it was supposed they would be sent as a sample of hand-labour. But that question had never been mentioned.

Chairman.

895. In the case of the competition at Sheffield you mean?—Yes.

Mr. Albert Bright.

896. As I understand you, when they found that these three particular files had been cut by machinery then there was such indignation on the part of somebody that the files were excluded from the museum?—No; they were not excluded from the museum. They were never sent.

897. Who did not send them?—I did not send them. I had them. I was the secretary, and I did not send them.

898. You did not send them for fear of the indignation of the community?—The people who were indignant about it were not indignant with us about it. They were indignant. They were indignant with their brother workmen who had not discovered it.

899. The thing was considered so discreditable, was it, to the hand-file cutters, that it was thought best not to exhibit them?—To let the matter die out; die a natural death.

900. It was thought that it would cause a great deal of jealousy, I suppose?—Yes.

Sir James Joicey.

901. You referred to the question of health of those engaged in file making; was I right in gathering that the health of the hand-file cutters is very much worse than that of the machine cutters?—Yes.

902. Have you any statistics to that effect?—Dr. Hallam is here, and he will give you evidence on that point.

903. As a matter of fact, it would be really to the advantage of the community, so far as health is concerned, if the whole of the files were cut by machinery?—Yes, certainly.

904. You said that workmen had to lift 600 tons a week at hand-cutting?—Yes.

905. How is that, as compared with the work as done by machine-cutting?—The machine-cutter has nothing to lift. He simply stands by the side of the machine.

906. And practically it is a great saving in that way?—Yes. What I alluded to was this: To cut 20 dozen of mill-saw file sides eight inches, there are 350 teeth on a side, and with a 7lb. hammer a man would lift 601 tons 5 cwt. And that would come to 28*s.* 4*d.*, which is subject to a little discount, making 25*s.* nett.

907. You were asked by Mr. Stuart-Wortley with regard to the change of the mode of manufacture. I suppose that every manufacturer is at liberty to change the mode of his manufacture, provided he improves the article that he sells?—He is at liberty to change the mode of his manufacture in any way he likes.

908. And, of course, if he can adopt any means of improving his machinery to effect the purpose he has in view, he would do so?—He would do so.

909. Has there been any large increase of files cut by machinery as compared with hand-cut?—Yes.

910. What is your view of the general tendency?—There would not be the workmen in the town if we had not machines now. The work could not possibly be done. There are thousands of pounds worth more files sold now than there were under the old rule.

911. Then, I gather the tendency is for the number of hand-cutters to decrease, and for the number of machine-cutters to increase?—For the machine-cutters to increase, and for the hand-cutters to slightly decrease.

912. That change has been going on steadily?—Yes.

913. With regard to foreign trade you made some remarks. Would it put this country to any great disadvantage with its foreign competitors if manufacturers were compelled to add additional marks to their files?—Yes, certainly; because the moment you put anything on them that a foreigner could draw attention to he would use that as a lever against such goods.

914. And, consequently, if each sort of file were marked "hand-cut" or "machine-cut," that would tend to prejudice the British-made files as against American and German-made files?—Yes, certainly it would.

915. And, of course, manufacturers in other countries, not having any Bill to contend with, would be able to compete on more advantageous terms?—Yes.

Mr. Burt.

916. I think most of my questions have been anticipated; but there are one or two points on which I am not clear, and which I should like to have cleared up. You gave some interesting facts relating to experiments that were made, as I think, in connection with the exhibition of 1885?—Yes.

917. And if I understood you aright you said that these files were not sent to the museum on account of the indignation of the workmen, or something to that effect?—No, it was not on account of the indignation of the workmen; but the workmen, and everybody else, were so surprised at the result, that I personally took it upon myself not to send them, and I did not send them.

918. Was it the workmen generally of Sheffield connected with the trade, or workmen who were adjudicators in connection with this?—The general workmen connected with the trade had appointed their own three umpires, who were fellow-workmen, and these judges had never found it out that these things had been on a machine. So that their practical knowledge was simply of no avail.

919. Was it stipulated, or was it in any way understood, that the files were to be hand-made files?—No, it was never mentioned, because machinery was never thought of in the question. It was simply one of those things that you cannot get over. No one imagined that a machine-made file was in the question at all. And it was only when the result turned out that it came out that they were machine-made files.

Mr. Stuart-Wortley.

920. The whole community were taken in for want of a mark?—There was to be no mark. That was distinctly stated in the competition.

Chairman.

921. What were the terms of the competition. Was it said that they were to be the best files, or was there any stipulation either for hand-made or machine-made?—There was no stipulation how they should be made. The stipulation was for the three best files; but there was to be no mark to let you know who had done the work.

Mr. Burt.

922. They were to be simply tested on their merits as to the best article?—Yes.

923. You referred to the question of health, and said that, as compared with machine-made files, the hand-made work is more injurious to health?—Yes.

924. You also said that recently there had been considerable improvement, as regards health, so far as hand-made file cutters were concerned?—Yes; part of that improvement is, of course, due to the fact of the workmen having a higher standard; but it is no doubt partly due to the fact that there is not so much heavy work. The heavy work is done by the machines. Therefore there are not so many of the men doing heavy work.

925. Looking at the matter mainly from the point of view of health, would you say that is a serious element in the question, that the hand-cut workman is subjected to a serious risk in any way?—No, because the machines are now absorbing the hand-cut workmen. If the whole of the files were cut by hand, as they formerly were, it would be a very serious matter, very serious indeed.

926. As regards wages; other things being equal, equal, that is, having equally skilled and equally capable workmen, is there much difference, comparing the hand-cut with the machine-made?—The machine-cutter, I think, would average more money than the hand-cutter.

927. He would average higher wage?—He would get a higher wage than the hand-cutter.

928. I did not understand you to lay much stress upon the question of the cost of marking, though you referred to it as an element?—I do not care anything about it. If the law compels us we shall mark them; but I did not take that into consideration.

929. Then as to the difficulty arising from want of space, on the smaller file. Would you say that in the case of the files now made that would be a great difficulty?—On very small files it would. In fact I was in conversation with one of our leading manufacturers a few days ago, and he told me that they had certain orders, and their brand had to be marked on three sides of the file, their registered mark had to be marked on three sides of the file; therefore the registered mark alone took the whole of the space up. They could not put the name. They could only put the registered mark.

930. Will you state why?—Because it must be marked where the people were anxious to have it, were particularly anxious to see it. In addition to that we have very often to mark the initials of the customer; for instance, in the case of large engineering works, the customers often have their initials marked on the files to prevent the files being stolen, so that no one will buy them.

931. Are there at present many files made in this country of so small a size that it would be difficult, if not impossible, to mark them?—Yes, there are large quantities of very small files; but there is no great amount in value.

Mr. Brooke Robinson.

932. As a matter of fact, many firms at Sheffield at the present moment mark their files "machine-cut"?—There are firms in Sheffield who mark "machine-cut," and mark "hand-cut."

933. And they do not apprehend any difficulty, such as you have referred to, with electric engineers, in consequence?—No.

934. I think you have said you make both kinds of file?—Yes.

935. Do you put the same trade mark on both?—Yes.

936. So that these men that we have heard of would have considerable difficulty in telling one file from the other?—They cannot tell one from the other.

Chairman.

937. I want to understand what the practice is; if a man is at work at his trade, and needing the use of a file, is it usual for such a workman to supply himself with his own files, or is it usual for the employer to supply them?—The employers find the files, as a rule. In some of the Sheffield trades the workmen find their own files; I may say that wherever the workmen buy their files, they pay the highest price of anybody.

Chairman—continued.

938. They have the strongest interest in securing the best file?—Yes.

939. Have you any reason to think they are much deceived, as to getting an inferior article to that which they want, or that they find themselves deceived into getting a machine-made file for a hand-made file?—No; I do not know that they are.

940. Or that they suffer any disadvantage if they are so deceived?—I do not know that the question is ever raised.

941. Take the general run of hand-made, and the general run of machine-made files, what do you say as to whether one is inferior to the other, or as to their being about equal?—If they are equally done, and if they are made of the same material, one is just as good as the other.

942. That is taking the best of each?—Yes.

943. But I wanted to know whether your observation had enabled you to judge about the general run of files that are met with and used in workshops. There are a number of machine-made, and a number of the other. Is it difficult for a workman to get a machine-made one of such make as will answer his purpose?—You cannot make all kinds, you know.

944. I am speaking of the general run of them, as between consumers on the one hand, and makers on the other. The point to decide is whether the consumers are so liable to be preyed upon that they cannot get what they want. Now, taking the ordinary workman, who is so careful in the selection of his files, do you apprehend that he has any difficulty in getting a first class article, and if it be first class, does it matter whether it is machine-made or hand-made?—Not the slightest.

Mr. Stuart-Wortley.

945. Is it not the fact that these small American files which you said were too small to be marked, are every one of them marked?—I have not looked at them. But it was not in reference to those files that I said they were too small to be marked. I said they might all of them be marked except one; that there was only one there that we should not mark in our works, and that was the round one.

946. Did you notice that all of them were marked "machine-cut"?—I did not.

947. Others have got initials upon them?—I did not notice it.

Chairman.

948. I think it was the Swiss ones you said were too small to be marked?—Yes; as to American ones, I said those could all be marked except one. There is one file there that I should not mark, because I consider it is too small. It is the round one.

Sir James Joicey.

949. With regard to the small files, you said you wished to treat the men well, but that you have not made these small files hitherto though you might hereafter have to do so?—Yes.

950. What impression ought I to gather from that?—I mean to say that if this Bill were to pass we should be almost immediately compelled to put down machines to do the little work that we have not done up to now.

Chairman.

951. Why?—It is simply because we are English. We are forced into this sort of thing. We do not go to the front. We let Americans put down machinery, and then we follow on.

952. I gather from that that the number of hand-cutters would be in consequence decreased?—Yes, they would steadily decrease; and they will steadily decrease.

Mr. Jacks.

953. I think Mr. Bright asked you this question: If both the hand-cut files and the machine-cut files were marked with the respective marks, would it place them both at a disadvantage in, say, Eastern markets, as compared with, say, the German or the American competitor, because the competing German or American would point to those marks as to something not desirable; was that your opinion?—Yes, it was, with regard to Russia. I think that I said that.

954. Then a reply you gave to Mr. Burt was this: that in certain cases you had to put other marks besides your trade mark; for instance, large machine works order their initials to be put on the files to show that they are their own property; is that so?—Yes.

955. Now the question I want to put to you, arising out of those two answers of yours, is this: Supposing that you receive an order from Russia, or from the East, and the party who gave you the order asked you to mark their initials upon the files, would you do it?—Yes.

956. If they were for merchants who had to sell them again?—Yes; in any case, if we had such an order, we should put it on.

957. Did it not occur to you that that would have precisely the same effect upon the ignorant buyer as would the words "hand-made"?—It would only have reference to that one order, and that would be a condition on which alone we could have it. If we did not put it on somebody else would.

958. In reply to Mr. Burt, again, you said that the improved conditions of health of the hand-cutters was to some extent owing to the change in the manufacture of files. Is the Committee to understand from that answer that the health of the workmen has improved, and that their conditions have improved owing to the large files being now exclusively made by machinery?—That is my personal opinion.

Mr. Jacks—continued.

959. My next question has been partially anticipated by Sir James Joicey. Why do not you make small files, when there are so many used in this country?—I cannot tell you why we do not. We were gradually forced into making machine-made files through competition, and we shall be compelled to make these in time. We have not made them up to now.

960. If there is a demand for them in this country, why do you allow the foreigners to make them. Why do not you lay down the necessary machinery?—Because, as I said before, we are English, and we are forced into these things. We are not pioneers.

Chairman.

961. You have told us that for the purpose of machine-making you employ hands that are already versed in hand-cutting, that those are the best men?—Yes.

962. How long does it take a man, who has been used to hand-cutting, to be able to take charge of and be equally active or capable with a machine?—It depends, of course, upon the ability of the man very greatly.

963. Is it a question of weeks or months?—Well, a few weeks.

964. I suppose the precision with which he works as a first-rate workman at hand cutting can only be obtained by probably seven years' labour, apprenticeship, and so on?—Yes.

965. But it is easy, you say, for him to go from one branch to the other?—The first machine file cutter that was employed at our works was with us for 20 years as a hand-cutter, and then he lost the use of his thumb through hand-cutting; but he was a very good one, and he could whet a chisel that no one could beat it, and he was put on the first machine that was employed. That is often the case with many of the people. Many of the men who were practically incapacitated from working as hand cutters are first-class workmen as machine-cutters.

Mr. Pierpoint.

966. If both sorts were marked am I right in supposing that your apprehension would be that if hand-made files were marked "hand-made" and machine-made files were marked "machine-made" it would affect the sale of British files in competition with foreign?—Yes.

967. In machine-cut files can sand-blasting be used?—Yes; in both machine-cut as well as hand-cut.

Dr. ARTHUR HALLAM, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

968. ARE you a Member of the Royal College of Surgeons?—Yes.

969. You have practised at Sheffield as a surgeon for 25 years?—Yes, that is so.

970. For four years you were resident house-surgeon, and have been honorary surgeon for nine years at the Sheffield Infirmary?—Yes.

Chairman—continued.

971. You have had frequently to deal, probably, with cases of lead-poisoning?—Yes, I have.

972. Have some of those, or a majority of them, been caused by file-cutting by hand?—I am referring to cases that were caused by file-cutting by hand.

973. Confine your attention to those; had you many many such cases when you were at the infirmary?—Yes, a very great number.

974. And does that observation extend to the present time or have the numbers diminished?—I have been very much struck with the fact that the numbers have declined.

975. They were cases of lead-poisoning, were they?—Yes, they were.

976. Is it your judgment that those cases arise from the handling of lead in the course of manufacture?—Well, that was the opinion I formed.

977. Were those cases very common some 15 or 20 years ago?—Yes, very common.

978. Have they gradually become fewer?—Yes, that is the case.

979. Is it under your observation that the number of hand file cutters has greatly diminished of late years?—Yes, I do not so frequently come across young people who are learning the file-cutting trade by hand, not nearly so frequently.

980. They have practically been, and are in course of being, replaced by machine file cutting?—Well, I come across them occasionally; in fact, only a fortnight ago I came across a man who had been brought up to hand-cutting, and at the age of 23 he was obliged to discontinue because of the effect it had upon his health, and although it was four years after that time, he presented himself for examination for joining the Midland Railway Company (I examine for the Company). I was struck with the fact that although it was four years after the time he had given up file cutting by hand, he still had a blue line along the gum indicating that he still had lead in his system.

981. Is the mischief caused by the absorption of lead into their system?—Of course, that is more far-reaching. You get certain symptoms developed.

982. And do those lead to indigestion?—Yes, you get indigestion, in the first instance, then anæmia.

983. And sometimes paralysis?—It is very common. It was very common indeed to have paralysis years ago.

984. And I suppose it would affect future offspring?—Naturally, it must influence them.

985. Have you had any experience of women employed in the work?—Oh, yes.

986. An effect upon their health?—Yes; and I was also struck with the fact that hand-cutting is carried on at home, and these houses are not under the Factory Act, and are not visited by the inspectors, and therefore it is injurious in that respect.

987. You think it is better for the health of the community that the cutting by machinery should prevail over the cutting by hand?—Yes, from a medical point of view. I think even if they had to pay rather more for machine-made files it would be a benefit to the community at large.

Mr. Stuart-Wortley.

988. Will you explain in what way the operation of cutting a file by hand creates this lead-poisoning?—It is only from what I have been told. Of course, I have seen them cutting, and

Mr. Stuart-Wortley—continued.

I know this, that they use a bed of lead, and in the cutting naturally there is some amount of débris comes from it, some amount of waste, and this gets into the hand.

989. It is through the hand it is communicated to the mouth?—Yes.

990. Is there any other way in which the lead poisoning is communicated?—I have no doubt there is some amount of absorption, even through the skin of the hands.

991. Then you do not know how the machine-cutting operation is carried on?—I do not.

992. Are you aware that there was a petition presented from Sheffield in favour of this Bill, every one of the signatures to which was that of a working file-cutter, and that there were 1,800 signatures?—I am not aware of the number.

993. If you were made aware that of those 1,800 signatories 1,248 were between the ages of 20 and 49?—I can quite understand that.

994. Does not that point to a very healthy condition?—It is frequently the case that there is a constitutional disposition to absorb, and it is in those cases where "the weakest go to the wall."

995. If the statistics of the petition show that that very large proportion were signatures of men between those ages, that does not look as if it was a trade in which men succumbed very early in life?—I do not think it alters the fact that it is so. I mean to say I have seen so many cases where hand-cutting has really been the cause.

996. Does it surprise you at all to know that is the proportion of figures?—It would not alter my opinion, I think.

Chairman.

997. Would it not be necessary, in order to make those valuable as statistics, to have a complete list of all the number?—Yes, undoubtedly. I do not know the number of file-cutters.

998. It does not show how many have died within the intermediate periods?—No, I cannot say that it would influence my opinion in the least.

Mr. Pierpoint.

999. I do not quite understand whether Dr. Hallam can tell us what is the percentage of lead-poisoning in the trade?—I cannot do that, because I do not know the number of file-cutters.

Sir James Joicey.

1000. I suppose you will admit that file-cutting generally is about one of the most unhealthy occupations in the country, judging from statistics—Dr. Ogle's statistics?—I think he refers to hand-cut files. I do not think the trade of cutting files by machinery is more injurious than the ordinary work connected with the steel trade.

1001. Of course we know that all industries where lead has to be used to any extent, and comes in contact with the hand, or comes up in the shape of dust, are injurious; but that is only used in the manufacture of hand-made files?—That is only used in the manufacture of hand-made files.

1002. And that is the cause of the injury?—That is so, undoubtedly.

Mr. FRANK MAPPIN, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

1003. WHAT is your firm?—Thomas Turton and Sons, Limited, Sheaf Works, Sheffield.

1004. Your firm has been long established and pretty well known in Sheffield?—Yes.

1005. Are you exclusively file manufacturers, or is that merely one branch of many?—That is one branch of several.

1006. And are you makers both by hand and by machinery, or solely by machinery?—By both.

1007. You have considered this Bill, and considered what effect, in your judgment, it would have upon the file-cutting industry of Sheffield, and of England generally, perhaps; do you object to the Bill?—I do.

1008. Do you admit that a file cut by hand is superior to a machine-cut file?—I do not.

1009. But one may be better made than the other, I suppose; a machine-made one may be better than a hand-cut, and a hand-cut may be better made than a machine-cut in particular instances?—Yes.

1010. But do you say that the best of each are on the level for durability, finish and quality; or do you give preference to the machine-made?—In the case of my own firm, in some instances I give the preference to the machine-made.

1011. And do you see any effect that is beneficial in the interest of the public from the Bill?—None whatever.

1012. Do you think the public is indifferent, or the consumer is indifferent whether he gets a hand-cut or a machine-cut, provided it is a good one?—I believe the consumer is indifferent, provided he gets the best value he can for his money.

1013. As far as deceiving him is concerned, I suppose the machine-made one may be made in all respects so that you would not tell it from a hand one?—It is so.

1014. In a general way, supposing you received an order or entered into a contract to supply files, would you feel yourself at liberty to send either machine-cut or hand-cut files according to your own convenience?—We should endeavour to supply the best file that we could produce, irrespective of the way in which it was made, unless we guaranteed to make it in a certain way.

1015. If the stipulation was for hand-cut, you must supply hand-cut?—Yes.

1016. Although you might perhaps be of opinion that they were possibly inferior to what you would make otherwise?—That is so.

1017. Do you export much, or do you supply shippers with them, and do they export?—We export ourselves a large quantity of files to the consumers and merchants abroad.

1018. What would be the effect, do you think, upon the export trade of stipulating for stamping upon the shoulder or tang these special words?—That where we had to meet foreign competition in those markets, the foreign manufacturer who exported them there also, and whose competition we had to meet, would have an advantage in not being compelled to stamp on the files the way in which his files were produced; sometimes to the detriment of the English manufacturer.

1019. You have been party to, I believe, and approved of some printed objections that have been handed in, have you not?—I have.

1020. Do you produce a copy of them?—Yes. [For Objections, see Appendix.]

1021. Does it contain the objections of the trade which you are ready to support by your own evidence if required?—Yes, that is so.

Mr. Stuart-Wortley.

1022. You say that the consumer is indifferent as to which quality he gets. Where do you come in contact with the consumer as a manufacturer?—We come in contact with the purchaser of the file, the manufacturer who buys files for his workpeople.

1023. You sell to another person who sells again, do not you?—We sell to the manufacturer, who buys for his workpeople, and also to the merchant.

1024. You sell to the merchants, and also sell to employers of workmen who are ultimately consumers?—Yes.

1025. Do you advertise your files?—Yes.

1026. Do you ever say in your advertisements that your files are machine-cut?—We never say how they are made.

1027. You never make any statement either way?—No, except that we rely on our name and one trade mark, and the quality of what we produce.

1028. You are aware, I suppose, that some Sheffield firms do advertise their files as handmade?—I am; yes.

1029. And some as machine-cut?—I have seen those advertisements.

1030. Now do you think that they suffer at all in consequence of advertising them as machine-cut?—I do not think they would do so if they found it injurious.

1031. Now, in reference to this statement of objections. You say that "the Bill is promoted in the interest of one class of labour, the hand-cutters, as against another class of labour, the machine-cutters, equally as deserving in every respect." Have you had any evidence that that is the origin of the Bill?—That is more supposition than anything else.

1032. Did you send an exhibit of files to one of the Australian exhibitions?—No.

1033. Did not you send an exhibit of files which were the same as some files that were exhibited in the Exhibition of 1862?—I do not remember it.

1034. You are, perhaps, not aware of it. You are not the senior partner in the firm, are you?—I am not. I am the managing director.

1035. The senior partner is the honourable Member for Hallamshire?—Yes, he is the chairman.

 1036. You

Mr. Stuart-Wortley—continued.

1036. You do not know anything as to this exhibit?—I believe we did not send any.

1037. It is suggested to me, and perhaps you can inquire and let us know, that you exhibited in Australia an exhibit of files which had been shown in the Exhibition of 1862, which were all hand-cut, and that you preferred to send those hand-cut files to Australia, and did not add to them any machine-cut?—Could you give me the date of that exhibition?

1038. I cannot; I will try and do so; the Australian Exhibition?—I think I am right in stating that we did not exhibit any files there as far as my memory serves me.

1039. Perhaps you will inquire?—I will do so.

Wednesday, 26th June 1895.

MEMBERS PRESENT:

Mr. Albert Bright.
Mr. Burt.
Mr. Heath.
Mr. Hopwood.
Mr. Jacks.
Sir James Joicey.
Mr. Pierpoint.
Mr. Charles Shaw.
Mr. Stuart-Wortley.

MR. HOPWOOD, IN THE CHAIR.

MR. FRANK MAPPIN, re-called; and further Examined.

Chairman.

1040. HAVE you anything you wish to add to the evidence you gave to the Committee on the last occasion?—Perhaps I may be allowed to make some further remarks with regard to the last question addressed to me by Mr. Stuart-Wortley, on which I promised to make further inquiry. I was asked if we had ever supplied files to be sent to the Australian Exhibition, and I told the honourable Member that, so far as my memory served me, we never exhibited there. On further inquiries that statement is more fully confirmed. We never have sent any files to the Australian Exhibition. Perhaps in putting that question Mr. Stuart-Wortley was thinking of the Paris Exhibition. I could say something about the Paris Exhibition if that would be of any information.

Mr. Stuart-Wortley.

1041. It may be that my information was incorrect; would you tell us what the case is in regard to the Paris Exhibition?—The last exhibition we sent files to was the Paris Exhibition of 1878. Some of those files were, as you stated, hand cut, and some of them were machine cut. The hand-cut files that were sent were made for the Exhibition of 1851. Some of them were 4 feet long and some of them 3 feet; they were sent simply as curiosities.

1042. They were sent merely as exhibits?—Yes, and to attract attention, not for manufacture.

1043. Then it is not the case that the whole of your exhibits at Paris consisted of hand-cut files?—No; it is not.

1044. Did you ever advertise at all to customers that you had commenced cutting by machinery?—No.

Chairman.

1045. How many years have you cut files by machinery?—We bought our machines in February 1871.

Mr. Albert Bright.

1046. Were they the British Hardware Company's machines?—I can hardly say. We bought them from a company in Birmingham.

Mr. Stuart-Wortley.

1047. Was that a company carrying on business at a place called Smethwick?—Yes.

Mr. Albert Bright.

1048. Has file-cutting machinery much improved since that time?—We are still using the same machines, but with greater improvements which we have found it necessary to add since, to meet the requirements of the trade.

1049. The files made now by machinery are better than they were at the earlier stages of machine-cutting?—We have tried to advance with the times, and take advantage of every improvement, and keep pace with the requirements of the market.

1050. Do you think that the failure of that manufactory, which made machine-cut files about 30 years ago, was owing to the imperfection of the files made, or to the fact that they were boycotted by the mechanics?—I hardly know which of the works you are referring to.

1051. I mean the British Hardware Company?—That was a Manchester company, I think, was not it.

1052. Yes?—I never saw any of their files, and I should not like to speak with authority upon that point.

1053. Is it the case that people often stipulate that they should have hand-cut files supplied to them?—Practically, it is never stated, so far as we are concerned; it is too well-known how we make our files.

1054. It is not within your knowledge that anybody has ever been deceived by having machine-cut files delivered to him when he wanted hand-cut files?—The only public cases of which I am aware are those that were stated by a former witness at the beginning of these proceedings. The account of those cases appeared in the public press.

1056. Is the machine cutting of files greatly increasing in comparison with the hand-cutting?—The

Mr. Albert Bright—continued.

—The one is enormously increasing, and I should say that the other is, comparatively speaking, so diminishing.

1057. Are there more people employed in Sheffield on machine-cutting files than in hand-cutting?—Do you mean, are there more machine-cutters than hand-cutters?

1058. Yes?—There are more hand-cutters at present, I believe.

1059. I understand that the machine-cutters can turn out a very much larger number of files than the hand-cutters can?—Certainly.

Chairman.

1060. I understood from former witnesses that in making machine-cut files you need rather special care on the part of the mechanic who guides the machine?—Yes. In our works we now train the men up to that work from their youth.

1061. One such skilled man would, I presume, suffice to work the whole machine, turning out a number of files?—Yes.

Mr. Stuart-Wortley.

1062. Previously to your buying these machines, your firm had built up a reputation by the manufacture and sale of hand-cut files, had they not?—Yes; there was then no other means of producing them except that.

Chairman.

1063. Have you lost your reputation since?—Well, it is hardly for me to say, considering that our trade has enormously increased of late years.

Mr. Albert Bright.

1064. You do not regret having introduced machine-cutting into your business?—Certainly not.

Mr. Pierpoint.

1065. Can a file, as fine as this file (producing a file) be cut by machinery?—I am not an expert, of course; but these (producing some files) are Swiss files cut by machinery, and I think you will find that these files are as fine as the one you handed to me.

1066. They are finer, I think; do you cut files as fine as these?—Not by machinery.

1067. Do you cut them as fine as that by hand?—Yes, but we have not machines to cut as fine as that.

Mr. Jacks.

1068. But you could get them if necessary, I presume?—Yes, certainly.

Mr. Albert Bright.

1069. What are these Swiss files used for; are they used for jewellery?—Yes, and for the fine parts of machinery.

Mr. Charles Shaw.

1070. Is the reason why you buy these exceedingly fine files from Switzerland, and do not make them in England, the same reason as was given by a former witness, namely, that you do not wish to do away with the trade of the hand cutters altogether; that is to say, that there is a desire to live and let live, as far as possible?—We do not buy any files from Switzerland. The files I have just produced are simply some I have bought as samples in London, myself.

1071. Then I will put my question in another form: Is the reason why these exceedingly fine files are made in Switzerland, and not in this country, the same as was expressed by a former witness, who said that there was a live and let live policy in vogue as between masters and men, and that it was not desired to entirely take away the trade of hand-cutting from the hand cutters, and that therefore, unless they were driven to it, the masters would not manufacture by machinery certain classes of files which are at present only manufactured abroad by machinery; would that be your view?—It sounds a little too philanthropic.

1072. Is it due to a philanthropic or a practical reason that these exceedingly fine files are not made in this country by machinery?—I should prefer you to ask that from a more practical witness who will come later on, who will speak with regard to the cutting of these files in this country, and who knows more about the hand cutting of files than I do. If we found ourselves compelled to get machines to cut these files, we should do so; but as long as we can get them cut to advantage by hand-cutters, we shall not, certainly, go in for getting machines.

Chairman.

1073. I understand such fine files as these are manufactured in this country by hand-cutters?—Yes, by hand-cutters.

1074. But you have abstained so far from competing by making these fine files by machinery?—Yes, because we have not found it to our advantage to get these files cut by machinery at present.

Mr. CHARLES BELK, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

1075. You are, I believe, a Manufacturer in Sheffield, of upwards of 30 years standing?—I am.

1076. During 20 years of that time have you taken an interest in the affairs of the Cutlers' Company and the Chamber of Commerce there?—Yes.

1077. You have served the offices of Master Cutler and President of the Chamber of Commerce?—Yes.

Chairman—continued.

1078. You have considered the Bill which is under the consideration of the Committee?—Yes.

1079. Do you think it is desirable to pass it into law?—I think it is very undesirable.

1080. Is that upon the general grounds that you

you advocate the invention and improvement of mechanical means to save personal labour?—Yes.

1081. Is that really and truly the direction in which progress is being made in all machinery?—Throughout manufactures generally, I believe.

1082. Have you also an objection to it, on the ground of its being, in your mind, a novelty that manufacturers should be compelled under penalties to distinguish in the article manufactured between hand-made and machine-made goods?—To me that is quite a new principle, and I think it is one of the strongest arguments against this Bill becoming law.

1083. You are, perhaps, in favour of the manufacturer at his own pleasure stamping the article with his own name as evidence of bona fides in respect to its quality?—Certainly, if he so wishes.

1084. But you object to any compulsion in that direction?—That is so.

1085. You also found some objection upon the ground that legislative interference in commerce is apt to produce the contrary effect to that which is desired; that it impedes commerce?—I think it can hardly be denied that legislative interference with commerce, save for the purpose of preventing fraud, is undesirable. Commerce only wants to be left alone.

1086. Is there in this instance such a necessity or such an incentive to prevent fraud as, in your opinion, justifies this Bill?—Certainly not.

1087. Have you, so far as you are personally concerned, any pecuniary interest in any way, either in dealers or in users of files?—Being connected for so many years with the Sheffield trade, of which the file-manufacturing forms one, and a considerable, part, I cannot have passed through that number of years without coming largely into contact with both users of files and dealers in files, and manufacturers of files.

1088. Have you any prejudice on the one side or the other, so far as you are able to inquire into your own motives?—Not the least. I am perfectly disinterested in the matter.

1089. You consider it the best interest of every trader to effect the best means for securing the excellence of his wares?—Yes.

1090. To properly advertise them?—Yes.

1091. You suggest that the hand-makers may, if they please, voluntarily mark their own files?—There is nothing that I know of to prevent them doing so; and if there were a superiority in that method, I think they would be certain to adopt it from motives of self-interest.

1092. Do you draw the inference from their not having adopted that course, that the object of this Bill is to subject those who use machinery for file cutting, to the risks of these pains and penalties in order to represent the mark as a badge of inferiority?—That is my belief. I can conceive really no other motive for it.

1093. Do you think the Bill would secure the object of those who are its promoters?—Not at all. Eventually I think it would have exactly the contrary effect.

1094. Would you enlarge that a little and show us why you think so?—From my inquiries I cannot learn that there is in the minds either of users or dealers in files any belief in the superiority of the hand-cut file; and if this badge were for a moment taken as a badge of inferiority and were compulsorily marked upon goods, after a time the users of files would find that it was not so; and then instead of wanting to have the assumed superior file they would recognise that there was no superiority in it at all, and therefore a reaction would take place, and machine-cut files would possibly come more greatly into favour.

Chairman—continued.

1095. So that in your judgment the Bill would fail in its object?—That is so.

1096. Do you share the feeling that has been spoken to by former witnesses that it would affect our foreign trade?—Yes, I do think that; that is a question that the file manufacturers could really answer much better than myself; but at the same time I believe that it is so.

Mr. Stuart-Wortley.

1097. You think this Bill, if it were passed, would interfere with the manufacture of machine-cut files?—For the time to a slight extent, yes; afterwards not.

1098. Afterwards it is your opinion that it would have the effect of establishing the superiority of machine-cut files?—It would be found out that there was no inferiority in them, and then the consumer who uses the files finding there was no inferiority involved in the mark would say, "I am tired of suspecting these files."

1099. Have you seen this long list which has been put in of users and consumers of files who have petitioned in favour of this Bill; you think they are all wrong?—I should say that the consumers of files in the country may be numbered by hundreds of thousands, and if that is the list of all that can be obtained in favour of the Bill I should not attach much weight to it.

1100. The names in this list are those of firms; do you say that this is an insignificant representation of the large consumers of files?—I have not seen the list; I was looking at the numbers.

1101. The list gives the names of firms who employ consumers of files; do you suggest that is an insignificant representation?—My reply to that is that they form but a small fraction of the consumers of files throughout the country.

1102. I see here the Amalgamated Society of Engineers; is that an insignificant representation of the consumers of files?—I would say not, distinctly.

1103. How do you get rid of the fact that they desire to be placed in a position to know that when they seek to get hand-cut files they should be assured of getting them?—I have no individual acquaintance with the society, but from my knowledge of what working men generally say I do not think they care about it, and I certainly have a considerable acquaintance with working men who use files.

1104. You are not yourself a manufacturer of files?—I am not myself a manufacturer of files, but in my manufactory files are used.

1105. You yourself represent the Chamber of Commerce?—Yes, I came up for that purpose.

1106. The majority of them are not, if any, manufacturers of files, are they?—There are manufacturers of files amongst them, and on the council of the Chamber.

1107. But the manufacturers of files are not by any means the majority even on the council?

Mr. Stuart-Wortley—continued.

—I do not think any individual trade forms a majority either of the chamber or of the council.

1108. So that really your special knowledge and that of the Chamber of Commerce is limited to general views upon the legislation, and its effects upon commerce?—Yes, my own knowledge is. If I may speak for the chamber I must say that the individual members of the chamber are quite as well acquainted with the file trade as anybody else can be.

1109. Then do you contend, either for yourself or on behalf of the chamber, that the capitalist manufacturer, the man who pays the wages, or on the other hand the distributor, should have complete liberty to vary his sources of supply or his mode of manufacture without the consumer ever having any opportunity of knowing that he does so?—Generally speaking, I should say yes.

1110. Were you not yourself active in promoting the passing of the Merchandise Marks Act?—I was.

1111. Is it not the central principle of that Bill that the consumers should be brought into direct contact with the knowledge both of the mode of production and the place of origin?—No one can know better than yourself that the central principle of the Merchandise Marks Act was to stop fraud; and it stopped at that.

1112. Was not that Bill the outcome of the desire of the producing classes to get at close quarters with the consumers, and not to be interfered with by practices of any kind on behalf of the distributors and capitalist manufacturers?—The central principle of the Bill was to stop fraud, and it stopped at fraud. As you know, it turned upon this: that no false indication either of the mode of manufacture or the place of origin should be put on, there it stopped; it did not say that something shall be put on, but it said that something should not be put on; that is that a false indication of the place of origin or process of manufacture should not be put on.

1113. Do you say that the impulse which led to the passing of that Bill had no further tendency except that?—Repeatedly it was attempted and it has been attempted since to carry it further, and to insist upon something being put on.

1114. Are you aware that it was carried further in the very same year in which that Act was passed?—I do not exactly know in what direction you mean it was carried further.

1115. I am referring to the Margarine Act; how do you distinguish the two cases?—The cases are not exactly parallel.

1116. What is the distinction you draw between them?—I think you have put to me possibly the best illustration I could give; you mean as between butter and margarine?

1117. Yes?—Butter is the product of the milk of a live cow; margarine is the product of the fat of a dead animal; it may be bull, ox, horse, or even a much humbler animal; and it was in order to stop the fraudulent introduction of that different material that the Margarine Act was passed; so that the two things are not parallel, they are two totally different materials; they have nothing in common, save that they are both animal products. If you want to draw an exact parallel I think you have supplied it. Butter was formerly made almost entirely by hand. Of course the human hand is constantly throwing out perspiration, and that perspiration contains the elements of putrefaction; so that during the last few years in the best dairies the butter is never touched by the hand. Now, if in the interests of the old-fashioned makers of butter you were to insist on all butter that is now made without the intervention of the hand being marked "machine made," you have an exact parallel to what this Bill proposes to do in the case of files.

1118. You say that the Margarine Act was based on the principle of fraudulently putting on the market margarine in the place of butter?—Yes, a different material.

1119. Are you aware that the Act applies when there is not the slightest attempt at any kind of fraud?—Yes, in that way; but margarine is no more butter than dried sloe leaves are tea, or dried cabbage leaves are tobacco.

1120. Surely the Act has applied where nobody has even attempted to say it was butter?—Yes, I think it was almost obliged to be carried as far as that in order to render it perfectly effective.

1121. Was it not on the ground that the consumer himself could not tell the difference?—Undoubtedly; that one material was substituted for another.

1122. He could not tell which he was buying; was not that it?—He could not tell which he was buying.

1123. The Act applied even although the seller said nothing?—Exactly. Margarine can be made up to be a perfect colourable imitation of butter.

1124. Just so; you do not contend that margarine is injurious to health?—Not at all; neither are dried sloe leaves injurious to health.

1125. You do not contend, do you, that the consumer of files can tell for himself whether they are hand-cut or machine-cut?—I do not think he wants to.

1126. That is not my question; do you say that he can tell?—I do not believe that he can.

1127. You agree with the witnesses for the Bill who said that he cannot?—That is so; nor do I think he is injuriously affected thereby so far as my information goes.

1128. You admit, perhaps, that he is a better judge of that than even possibly yourself?—Certainly; my answer is the result of inquiries.

Mr. Charles Shaw.

1129. Is there any reason that you know of why the words "hand-cut" should not be substituted for "machine cut" throughout this Bill?—I do not think that the manufacturers of the hand-cut files would care for the Bill for a single minute if that were done, and that suggests to me the animus with which it has been introduced.

1130. You, yourself, or those who think with you, would have no objection to such transposition of words as to make the makers of hand-cut files stamp all their goods "hand-cut"?—I think it would be simply putting the manufacturers of hand-cut files and the workmen under under a disability, to which I object, my answer being that trade wants leaving to itself so long as fraud is prevented, and I do not think there has been any fraud in this matter.

1131. The purport of this Bill being to secure that the user of files shall be able to distinguish between hand-cut and machine-cut, or, in other words, that machine-cut shall not be foisted upon him for hand-cut, do you think the transposition of those words would effect the same purpose?—It would effect the same purpose, which, in my opinion, is quite unnecessary.

Mr. Heath.

1132. Had you a debate in your Chamber of Commerce as to whether somebody should come up and give evidence against the Bill?—I was up last year.

1133. Has there been a debate in your chamber?—Last year there was a debate; this year there has not been, because this is taken as a continuation of last year's Bill.

1134. Was there a division?—It was not necessary, as we were unanimous.

1135. Were they unanimous that you should come and give evidence against the Bill?—Yes.

Sir James Joicey.

1136. I gather from you that if the hand cutters had any idea that theirs was a better quality they would have no hesitation in taking advantage of a mark?—I think it is human nature; self-interest would dictate to them that if that were the better method they would adopt that method for the purpose of advancing their business.

1137. The impression which I gathered is that you do not think it would be any advantage?—Not at all.

Mr. Albert Bright.

1138. It is the case, I believe, that all makers of files put some mark upon the goods, either initials, or something else?—The mark they put on usually is the name of the manufacturer. Of course it is self-evident what that is done for; it is in order to let the consumer see by whom the file was manufactured, and if possible to induce him to come back to the same manufacturer. Self-interest is at the bottom of it of course.

1139. We have heard that it would be an additional expense to the makers of hand-cut files if they were forced to mark "hand cut" on their files; what do you say as to that?—I do not think, in making new files, that would be a material element. As this Bill would of necessity involve the words being put on files that are now made, it would in that case not only be an additional expense, but would be attended with great risk. They are made of hardened steel, and the very fact of impressing a mark on them would be very liable to break them.

1140. But supposing it were necessary to put "hand cut" on the files, it would be perfectly easy to incorporate it with the trade-mark of the firm, and cause no additional expense at all?—That is so. I do not think the question of expense really would be material.

Mr. Burt.

1141. I think you said that the Chamber of Commerce was quite unanimous against the Bill?—It was last year; there has been no meeting this year.

1142. Does the chamber consist to any extent, or largely, of manufacturers of files?—Speaking from memory, I should say there is a very considerable representation of file manufacturers on it; I should think almost all the principal firms really are members of the chamber.

1143. Would that apply to both hand-cut and machine-cut file manufacturers?—Yes.

1144. There was no difference of opinion, I understand?—There was no difference of opinion.

Chairman.

1145. I will just ask you about the illustration that was put to you of margarine; I have the Margarine Act here before me; the Act says, "Margarine shall mean all substances, whether compounds or otherwise, prepared in imitation of butter, and whether mixed with butter or not." You observe that it must be "prepared in imitation of butter"?—Yes.

1146. Does that come within your idea of the fraud which you were speaking of a while since?—It is the substitution of one material for another. Butter has highly nutritive qualities, and is very acceptable to the general palate, and, from its appearance, I do not think that margarine could be distinguished from it by the eye; hence my answer was that it is the substitution of one material for another material.

1147. And not only a substitution, but "prepared in imitation of butter"?—Clearly.

1148. Then, also, do you take into account that the substitution of the one for the other involved a question of public health which the Legislature might perhaps treat exceptionally?—I am not sure, because my memory does not sufficiently carry me back to the origin of the Margarine Act; but I think my answer with regard to the dried sloe leaves and the dried cabbage leaves almost carries it on the face; of course it would be fraudulent to substitute dried sloe leaves for tea, although dried sloe leaves are not injurious.

1149. Then, also, upon the question which you have referred to of the probable result of the Legislature disappointing its promoters, are you aware that margarine has been elevated in the market by the passing of this Act, and that it fetches a much higher price, and competes with the lower classes of butter?—I should imagine that the process of manufacturing margarine has been considerably improved since the time of its first introduction, and in all probability that would account for the additional demand for it.

Mr. Charles Henry Bingham, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

1150. You are a member of the firm of Walker and Hall?—I am.

1151. You are Master of the Cutlers' Company of Sheffield?—Yes.

1152. For the last 12 years you have taken, I believe, an active interest in all questions which have come before the company affecting trades marks in the general interests, I suppose, of the trade?—I have.

1153. Are you opposed to the Bill which is under the consideration of this Committee?—Yes.

1154. Do you consider it both unnecessary and unwise?—I do.

1155. Do you consider that a consumer of files can with certainty obtain hand-cut files if he wishes to do so?—I think so.

1156. By stipulation in the contract?—Yes, without difficulty.

1157. And are you of opinion that the consumer can move the tribunals against a man who deceives him?—Certainly.

1158. Has it been shown, in your opinion, that hand-cut files are superior to machine-cut?—It has not.

1159. Assuming both to be of the best quality as regards material and temper, you would say that it is not shown that the hand-cut are superior to the machine-cut?—I do not believe it has been.

1160. Does it follow from that, in your judgment, that if a man not having stipulated for any particular sort of file had machine-cut files supplied to him, when he expected to have the other, it is not shown that any damage has been committed against him?—Decidedly not.

1161. And there is no fraud, because he has not asked for that which he says now he wanted?—There is no fraud whatever.

1162. Do you agree that all manufacturers of standing strike their trade mark upon their files?—It is the custom of all Sheffield manufacturers to do so.

1163. And so stake their reputation upon the quality of their productions?—Yes.

1164. Do you also assign as a reason against the Bill that if hand-cut files be superior to machine-cut, it is open to makers of them to mark them as hand-cut?—Certainly.

1165. And thus to obtain any higher price which that might secure to them?—That would seem to me the natural result if hand-cut files possessed any superiority.

1166. I believe that the policy of the company of which you are the master has been to support measures for suppressing fraudulent marking, but otherwise to leave the method of marking to the discretion of the manufacturer?—That is so.

1167. Does it weigh with you that you are jealous of any unnecessary interference with the freedom of the manufacturer?—Very strongly.

1168. Do you think the Bill would promote the interests of hand-cutters?—I do not think it would.

1169. In what way would you expect it would falsify their expectation; would it have the effect of advertising the good quality of machine-cut files?—I think it would naturally call the attention of the purchaser of files, where they were marked machine-cut, to their quality, and that, naturally, when they were found to be of good quality, it would remove any possible prejudice in the mind of the person against machine-cut files.

1170. Do you think the Bill would interfere with home manufacturers in some cases where their files come into competition with foreign productions which are not under the same restrictions?—I think it would.

1171. Your particular objection, I think, is to the provision in Section 2 of the Bill, which would prevent a manufacturer of files even using unmarked machine-cut files in his own works?—Yes, the words in the section to which I refer are in the ninth and tenth lines of Sub-section 1 of Section 2.

1172. Section 2, Sub-section 1, provides that "After the commencement of this Act every file cut, wholly or partly, by machinery, and sold or exposed for sale, or used for any purpose of the trade, or manufacture in, or imported into the United Kingdom, shall be marked legibly and in a manner reasonably sufficient for the information of any purchaser with words stamped upon the shoulder or tang of the file, or upon any part of the file upon which it may be customary to place the manufacturer's mark or any other mark, and indicating that such file has been cut by machinery, or partly by machinery, as the case may be." Is that the provision you refer to?—Yes, that is the provision.

1173. You say you think that would prevent the manufacturer of files even using unmarked machine-cut files in his own works?—It appears to me that would be the result of that provision.

1174. That is to say, you assume that the absence of the condition that is required would become unlawful after this Bill passed, and therefore the manufacturer could not use unmarked machine files in his own works?—That strikes me as one of the results which would follow the passing of the Bill.

Mr. Stuart-Wortley.

1175. You are not yourself a manufacturer of files, are you?—I am not.

1176. Are you aware that the Bill of last year would have made it incumbent upon the makers of hand-cut files to mark their files, too?—I had forgotten that that was the case.

1177. And that that Bill was promoted with the same support from the men themselves as the Bill of this year?—I had lost sight of that fact.

1178. Are you aware that the change in the form of the Bill was entirely made to conciliate the manufacturers of hand-cut files?—I was not aware of that.

1179. It was not to conciliate any section of the the workmen but to conciliate the employers?—I was not aware of that.

1180. You say that the consumer can, if he thinks proper, insist upon having hand-cut files when he buys his files, if he wants hand-cut files?—Yes.

1181. Supposing he is buying them from some comparatively small retailer, how can he give effect to such a desire?—I think if he ordered hand-cut files, no retailer would risk the consequences of supplying machine-cut instead of hand-cut files.

1182. You do not suggest, do you, if there is no mark the Merchandise Marks Act applies?—Yes, I think it does.

1183. Even when there is no mark?—So far as I remember the Merchandise Marks Act, it would.

1184. It is in that belief that you have given your evidence; if a man went to an ironmonger and said, "Give me a hand-cut file," and he was given a machine-cut file, without anything more than a verbal representation being made, you think that the Merchandise Marks Act would apply?—Yes, in consequence of its being a false trade description.

1185. Even if it were a mere verbal description?—Yes.

1186. Has any Court ever been asked to hold that?—I cannot cite the case. But, of course, the consumer might make it more than a verbal description if he took the precaution of insisting on the files being invoiced.

1187. No doubt; but is it not the fact that a great many files are bought in small quantities by workmen who have to find their own files, and there is no question of invoice, or anything of the kind; they are bought across the counter?—No doubt.

1188. And in small quantities?—Yes; and in those small quantities I do not think there is any preference expressed for hand-cut files.

1189. That is not my question. Supposing there is such a preference, do you think in practice it is open or possible for any workmen to get an effective guarantee of the mode of manufacture of his files?—I think so. I do not think a retailer dare run the risk of selling a machine-cut file as a hand-cut file.

Chairman.

1190. If he knew it?—Yes.

1191. Of course, he may be deceived?—He should take care not to be.

Mr. Stuart-Wortley.

1192. Would he not take care not to know?—No; I think, on the other hand, he would take care to protect himself by knowing what he purchased.

Chairman.

1193. I should like to point out to you that the words in Section 2 of the Merchandise Marks Act are "every person who" "applies any false trade description to goods." It seems very doubtful whether that would cover a verbal contract; it seems as if in the companionship of the various stipulations of that section that the words mean a false trade description marked on the goods and physically applied to them in some way, possibly by a label?—I thought the Act included a verbal representation.

Mr. Heath.

1194. Are you giving evidence here on behalf of the Cutlers' Company?—Yes; the Cutlers' Company of Sheffield.

1195. You are giving evidence as representing them?—Yes.

1196. Are they unanimous against the Bill?—Yes.

Sir James Joicey.

1197. It was suggested that there had been a Bill last Session insisting upon both sorts of files being marked, and that the hand-cut manufacturers objected so strongly to it that the promoters of the Bill were obliged to withdraw the hand-cut files from the scope of the Bill; did I rightly gather that that was your impression?—I said I was not aware that that had been the case.

1198. I presume as the hand-cut file manufacturers opposed the previous Bill, which affected them so directly, they considered that it was a disadvantage to mark the files?—I cannot come to any other conclusion whether they opposed the Bill on the ground of that portion of the Bill, or whether they oppose it as a whole.

1199. That would seem to be the natural conclusion. Do I gather that the hand-cut file manufacturers are not opposing the Bill now, or do you represent both the hand-cut and the machine-cut file makers?—Both the hand-cut and the machine-cut.

1200. Then, practically, they oppose it altogether?—Yes.

1201. Is there any special demand for hand-cut files as against machine-cut files; are they often or ever asked for?—I have never heard of it.

1202. Consequently, that is the real reason there has been no trial of the question in connection with that?—Do you mean a trial as to the relative merits of the two kinds of files.

1203. No, I mean in a court of law?——

Mr. Stuart-Wortley.

1204. There have been prosecutions in cases where there was a written representation, or something on which you could apply the Merchandise Marks Act; that was given in evidence?—No doubt.

Sir James Joicey.

1205. However, your general impression is that the purchaser of a file is like the purchaser of anything else, a pair of stockings, for instance; that is to say, he does not care whether they are made by hand or by machine, so long as he gets a good quality?—Yes.

1206. Do you think it would affect hand-cut files if in foreign competition all the machine file makers in this country were compelled to mark their files; would not the tendency be for the purchaser abroad, or the consumer abroad, to conclude that all the files that were not marked were hand-cut?—Those who knew of the provisions of this Act, I suppose, would naturally come to that conclusion.

1207. The foreign manufacturers, if they were to make inferior files and sell them without marks, would give the impression, of course, that they were hand-cut?—I think that follows.

1208. Do you not think it would seriously affect the hand-cut file makers in this country if inferior articles were sold in that way, which were presumed to be hand-cut?—Yes, if they were sold as of English origin.

1209. But, so far as I gather from your evidence, you think it is not only against the interests of the separate industries of hand-cut and machine-cut files, but against the interests of file manufacturers altogether in this country to mark them?—I think so. I think it is an objectionable provision altogether.

Mr. Albert Bright.

1210. Can you say whether it is possible to distinguish with absolute certainty from examination whether a file is hand-cut or machine-cut?—I am not an expert enough to give an opinion on that question.

1211. Supposing this Bill were to become law, and all the British-made machine-cut files were to be so marked, and the hand-cut files were to be so marked, would it not be quite possible for foreign makers of these files to mark their exportations into this country with whatever mark they thought was most attractive; and if they did so, would it not be almost impossible for us to prevent files being fraudulently marked in that way?—Whether this Bill were passed or not, I should say it would be impossible for such files to pass our Customs.

1212. You do not quite follow my question; what could prevent an American firm marking whatever it likes on its files; suppose files were marked "made in America, hand-cut," how could the authorities at the ports here tell whether they were hand-cut or not?—Only by obtaining an expert's opinion.

1213. My previous question was whether it was possible to tell by examination whether a file was machine or hand-cut, and I thought you said you could not tell?—I said I was not sufficiently an expert to be able to answer that question.

Mr. Albert Bright—continued.

1214. Do not you think that it would be possible for them to make machine-cut files in the United States and mark them "hand cut," and get them into this country without its being detected?—I do not think it would, because I think the attention of our Custom House officers would be so called to those files that they would take care to ascertain whether they were or were not what they were represented to be.

1215. But would it be an easy thing to ascertain how they had been made in the foreign manufactory, or where the man who imported them to England had bought them?—From the evidence I have read which has been given by experts, I think it would be possible to do so.

Chairman.

1216. You think it would be possible to detect it?—Yes, from what I have heard.

1217. Why do you think so; I understand you are not yourself an expert?—No; I am only judging from the evidence I have heard upon the question.

1218. Do you mean from the evidence you have heard here?—I should say more exactly judging from what I have read.

1219. Where have you read that evidence?—As having been given before this Committee.

1220. But there is evidence both ways as to that, I think; there is a great contest of evidence whether you can tell the one against the other; some witnesses say you could and several, I think, say you could not; you assume that it would be possible to detect the difference; when you speak of the Custom House officers having their attention called to these small matters, and the probability of their attending to this, have you thought what that involves when you are considering practical legislation; does that enter at all into your calculation of the consequence that is to flow from such a Bill as this?—From my experience I have found that the Custom House officers' attention is given very carefully to any questions of the marking of files, or any question of that sort.

APPENDIX, No. 1.

PAPER handed in by Mr. C. B. Stuart-Wortley (a Member of the Committee), 29 May 1895.

Dear Sir, Sheffield, 6 April 1895.

We take the liberty of sending you copy of a letter which we directed to Sir Courtenay E. Boyle on the 14th June last, expressing our views with regard to the marking of machine-cut files.

As the Bill prepared, and brought by you before the House of Commons, is practically the same as Mr. Coleridge's, we think this letter may be of use to you. We leave you to deal with it as you may deem necessary.

Yours, &c.

(Copy.)

Sir, Sheffield, 14 June 1894.

From recent reports in the press we note that your Department has received deputations from the File Manufacturers' Association of Sheffield, the Cutlers' Company, and the Sheffield Chamber of Commerce, in opposition to the "Files Marking Bill," now before the House, in the name of Mr. Bernard Coleridge, and backed by Mr. C. Stuart-Wortley.

As one of the largest firms engaged in the manufacture of files in Sheffield, and we believe the largest manufacturers of hand-cut files in the world, having an average weekly output of 2,500 dozens, we maintain that our world-wide reputation for excellence of quality has been won by adopting exclusively the process of hand-cutting.

We desire to bring under your notice the following facts:—

Although members of the File Manufacturers' Association, we differ entirely from the views expressed by the deputation from that body.

We also take exception to the representatives of the Cutlers' Company and the Chamber of Commerce being considered as authorities upon this question, seeing that many of them have little or no knowledge of the file trade, and are not known to be in any way connected with it.

Our experience is that, by using a first-class material and adhering to the process of hand-cutting, with practical supervision, we have been able to maintain our position and reputation and to increase our business, notwithstanding the competition of machine cutters, who do not, as a rule, sell their files on their merits.

Our files are all carefully labelled "Warranted hand cut," and are so advertised in the leading trade journals.

We may state that we have experienced great difficulty in conducting our business in consequence of the deceptive practices resorted to by merchants and others dealing in machine-cut files, it being impossible for the consumer to know whether he is buying "hand-cut" or "machine-cut" unless he possesses thorough practical knowledge of hand-cutting.

The test we have applied, and the outcome of our business prove to us that, given a fair chance, hand-cut files are by far the more serviceable and reliable, and we respectfully submit that if the reputation of the Sheffield file trade is to be maintained, Mr. Coleridge's Bill must become law.

Trusting you will see that our views are placed before your Board and the Select Committee of the House of Commons,

We are, &c.

THE DECEPTION IN THE FILE TRADE.

To the Honourable the Commons in Parliament Assembled and the Select Committee re Files Bill.

Gentlemen,

In consequence of a large quantity of files cut by machinery, now being placed on the market by Sheffield manufacturers and others, bearing no mark by which they can be distinguished, in many cases being represented as and sold for hand-cut files to the permanent injury of the trade,—

We, the undersigned, being large buyers or consumers of files, hereby testify to our approval of the Bill now referred by your Honourable House to a Select Committee, and trust that the result will be to provide for the marking of files in such manner as shall enable merchants, dealers, and consumers, to know what they are purchasing, which is not the case at the present time.

APPENDIX, No. 4.

PAPER handed in by Mr. Frank Mappin, 19 June 1895.

OBJECTIONS of the Association of File Manufacturers residing within the City of Sheffield, in the County of York, and elsewhere, to the Merchandise Marks (Files) Bill, 1895, being substantially the same as a Petition presented by them against a similar Bill of last year.

A BILL, intituled, "A Bill to amend the Merchandise Marks Acts, 1887 and 1891, in respect of the Marking of Files," has been read a first time in the House of Commons, and is down for second reading on the 13th March 1895.

Such Bill provides that every machine-cut file shall be marked legibly, and in a manner reasonably sufficient for the information of any purchaser, with words indicating that it has been cut by machinery or partly by machinery.

Almost the whole of the files manufactured in Great Britain are made in Sheffield, and the Association is composed of manufacturers of all kinds of files, both those who produce solely hand-cut files and those who produce wholly or partially machine-cut files, and includes almost all the file manufacturers in the kingdom.

The members of the Association fail to see why their particular trade should be singled out for exceptional legislation, as, to the best of their belief, no attempt has ever been made to introduce any similar enactment with regard to any other branch of industry requiring an indication on the manufactured article of any particular process employed in its manufacture.

It is at present optional either to stamp or mark files hand-cut or machine-cut, as the case may be, or not to mark them at all.

The Bill is promoted in the interest of one class of labour, the hand-cutters, as against another class of labour, the machine-cutters, equally as deserving in every respect. The Bill implies that hand-cutting is necessarily superior to machine-cutting, which implication the Association entirely denies.

If hand cutters are to be legislated for in this way, there seems no reason why hand forgers of files and hand grinders of files should not equally be legislated for against machinery in their department, and why coke hardeners of files should not be protected against lead hardeners of files, and women scourers of files against steam scouring of files.

File cutting by hand is injurious to health, often causing lead poisoning, owing to the lead employed in the process. In machine file cutting no lead is used. Hand cutters are getting less numerous every year, and any legislation tending to bolster up their trade is detrimental from the point of view of public health.

The trade of Sheffield has been in the past very much crippled and injured in the manufacture of files, saws, edge tools, and other articles of hardware, through the objection of the workmen to permit the introduction of machinery into such manufactures, and through such objections, other countries, formerly large buyers of Sheffield goods, have been encouraged to manufacture for themselves.

A far greater weight and quantity of files are cut by machinery than by hand, and the proportion of machine-cut over hand-cut is growing greater every year. The Americans practically cut the whole of their files by machinery, and English makers of files now send few (if any) to America.

Other nations do not insist on such marking, consequently English machine-made files would be placed at a disadvantage in neutral markets.

Users of files know the quality they buy, and trust to the name, trade mark, and reputation of the file manufacturer, and not to an assertion whether the files are hand-cut or machine-cut.

Many manufacturers have such large stocks of files on hand that it would take years to exhaust them by means of ordinary sales, and in the case of these files already manufactured it would be very difficult to stamp the words provided by the Bill, and the cost of and the loss by breakage caused by so doing would be enormous.

The marking of the proposed words (in addition to the words already required to identify the manufacturer and his trade marks, particularly in the case of small files) would be a serious inconvenience and expense to the manufacturer in a trade in which the profit on sales is already very small, and would involve much extra care and trouble on the part of managers and workpeople to avoid errors.

In the case of files sent abroad the proposed words would probably convey no meaning to the customer, and would be quite useless and confusing, and in China and India would be taken for the name of the manufacturer and cause prejudicial mistakes in other ways.

Unless buyers of files knew that according to the Act (if the Bill should become law), all unstamped files were necessarily hand cut, the Bill would not have achieved its object of ear-marking hand-cut files.

The members of the Association feel assured that their reputations and trade marks are far better guarantees of the quality of a file or other article manufactured by them than any other description that could be stamped upon such file or article.

SPECIAL REPORT.

THE SELECT COMMITTEE to whom were referred all Private Bills promoted by Municipal and other Local Authorities, by which it is proposed to create Powers relating to POLICE and SANITARY REGULATIONS which deviate from, or are in extension of, or are repugnant to the General Law:—— HAVE agreed to the following SPECIAL REPORT:—

1. YOUR Committee having concluded their labours for the Session of 1895, desire to make the following Report upon the work they have done, and as to the considerations which have governed their decisions.

2. The following Bills were referred to your Committee: Brighouse Corporation, Clonmel Corporation, Croydon Corporation, Glasgow Corporation and Police, Southend-on-Sea Corporation, and South Shields Corporation.

3. Your Committee have never granted powers which are in excess of, or which contravene, the general law, except in cases where strong local evidence has been produced, and where, by such evidence, proof has been given that difficulties were experienced in the locality with which the existing law has been found unable to cope; or where it has appeared to them desirable, in the interests either of public health or of public convenience or security, that some powers should be granted to the locality other than those conferred upon them by the general law.

4. With reference to the periods for repayment of loans, your Committee have most carefully differentiated between work of a permanent and that of a temporary character, and they have endeavoured to put into practice the principle that the term for repayment shall be based upon the estimated life of the work in question, so that unfair burdens should not be thrown upon a future generation.

5. Your Committee have received most valuable assistance from Mr. Boyce, representing the Local Government Board. His departmental knowledge, experience of local legislation, and familiarity with the work of the Police and Sanitary Regulations Committee, make his presence essential to the due and satisfactory discharge of their duties. Your Committee also take this opportunity of acknowledging their obligations to Mr. Troup, who has ably represented the Home Office.

6. Your Committee desire to call the attention of those who are concerned in preparing and promoting Bills to the fact that it is desirable to adhere as closely as may be possible to the most recent precedents which Parliament has established. Much trouble and unnecessary expense would thereby be saved.

7. Your Committee suggest, for the consideration of the House, whether the time has not arrived for the inclusion in a Public Bill of many of the clauses which are so frequently introduced into Private Bills, and which have almost invariably been accepted by Parliament. It appears to your Committee that much trouble and expense might be saved if the necessity for application to Parliament for such powers by individual authorities were rendered unnecessary.

DRAFT SPECIAL REPORT, brought up by the Chairman, and read the first time, as follows:—

"1. YOUR Committee having concluded their labours for the Session of 1895, desire to make the following Report upon the work they have done, and as to the considerations which have governed their decisions.

"2. The following Bills were referred to your Committee: Brighouse Corporation, Clonmel Corporation, Croydon Corporation, Glasgow Corporation and Police, Southend-on-Sea Corporation, and South Shields Corporation.

"3. Your Committee have never granted powers which are in excess of, or which contravene, the general law, except in cases where strong local evidence has been produced, and where, by such evidence, proof has been given that difficulties were experienced in the locality with which the existing law has been found unable to cope; or where it has appeared to them desirable, in the interests either of public health or of public convenience or security, that some powers should be granted to the locality other than those conferred upon them by the general law.

"4. With reference to the periods for repayment of loans, your Committee have most carefully differentiated between work of a permanent and that of a temporary character, and they have endeavoured to put into practice the principle that the term for repayment shall be based upon the estimated life of the work in question, so that unfair burdens should not be thrown upon a future generation.

"5. Your Committee have received most valuable assistance from Mr. Boyce, representing the Local Government Board. His departmental knowledge, experience of local legislation, and familiarity with the work of the Police and Sanitary Regulations Committee, make his presence essential to the due and satisfactory discharge of their duties. Your Committee also take this opportunity of acknowledging their obligations to Mr. Troup, who has ably represented the Home Office.

"6. Your Committee desire to call the attention of those who are concerned in preparing and promoting Bills to the fact that it is desirable to adhere as closely as may be possible to the most recent precedents which Parliament has established. Much trouble and unnecessary expense would thereby be saved.

"7. Your Committee suggest, for the consideration of the House, whether the time has not arrived for the inclusion in a Public Bill of many of the clauses which are frequently introduced into Private Bills, and which have almost invariably been accepted by Parliament. It appears to your Committee that much trouble and expense might be saved if the necessity for application to Parliament for such powers by individual local authorities were rendered unnecessary."

DRAFT SPECIAL REPORT, read a second time, and agreed to.

Question, That this Report be the Report of the Committee to the House,—put, and agreed to.

Ordered, To Report, together with the Minutes of Proceedings.

REPORT.

THE SELECT COMMITTEE appointed to inquire and report what results have followed upon the Recommendations made by the Select Committee of 1876 77 for the Employment of meritorious Soldiers, Sailors, and Marines in Civil Departments of the Public Service; and to inquire whether any, and, if so, what further measures are desirable for the purpose of extending the employment of this class in those Departments, and also for helping them to obtain service, to such extent as they may be fitted for it, with private employers of labour;——

HAVE agreed to the following REPORT:—

Appointment of Committee.

YOUR Committee was first appointed on the 13th June 1894; but on the 3rd August 1894, finding that they had not time to conclude their inquiry, they recommended being re-appointed in the Session of Parliament then next ensuing. This was accordingly done, and this Report is therefore the result of the two inquiries, 1894 and 1895.

The Select Committee of 1876-77.

Dealing first with what may conveniently be called the historical part of the reference, your Committee find that the Select Committee of 1876-77 recommended, inter alia:—

(a.) That the appointments of permanent messengers, for which "soldiers and sailors appear especially suited," should, for the future, "be exclusively made from persons who have served." *

(b.) That "with reference to civil appointments made under the system of open competition, and for which soldiers and sailors are deemed to be suited, great care should be taken so to adjust the conditions of examinations as to give fair weight to those branches of knowledge in which their training has especially enabled them to make progress." †

(c.) That, in connection with the above, "the conditions as to age and marriage should also be carefully reviewed in some cases. If, for instance, the rule, that the superior limits of age may be extended in proportion to the period of a soldier's service, applies to a particular class of civil employment, it is manifest that in such cases the rule excluding married candidates should also be relaxed." ‡

The Select Committee, in making these recommendations, desired it to be understood that, "while mainly referring to the Army," they also wished to recommend "that similar advantages should be given to the marines, and also, where practicable, to sailors." § And the Report, to which your Committee have thus referred, concludes with this paragraph:—

"Your Committee, in conclusion, desire to express their earnest hope that the recommendations which they have made, and the evidence on which those recommendations are based, will be taken into consideration by the Departments concerned, with as little delay as possible."

Results of recommendations.

Nearly 18 years have elapsed since the above was written; and several changes of Ministry have taken place during that period. But it does not appear to your Committee,

* Report of Select Committee, 1876–77, para. 11.

Committee, after carefully inquiring into the subject, that the results have been, on the whole, commensurate with the necessities of the case.

War Office and Admiralty.

Of the various Public Departments which have had the means of complying with the recommendations referred to, the War Office and the Admiralty have, as might have been expected, been foremost in attempting some change of policy for the benefit of soldiers and sailors.

The Treasury.

The Treasury has, from time to time, taken important action in the same direction; and the civil community at large, stimulated by the action of the War Office, of the county and military authorities in the regimental districts, and of some of the great railway companies, has of late years taken up a more liberal and public-spirited attitude on this question.

Treasury Committee, 1883.

In 1883 the Treasury appointed a Committee, which reported in favour of employing Army and Navy pensioners in the outer and unclerical branches of the Civil Service.

And in 1891.

In 1891 the same Department reported, with regard to the appointment of office-keepers, messengers, and others, in a sense favourable to retired soldiers and sailors. But until March 1894, the Treasury had only issued minutes giving their sanction, as an experiment, to the employment of Navy and Army pensioners as "temporary messengers in Public Departments," but expressly signifying that such employment "would not be given exclusively to soldiers or sailors."

War Office action in 1884.

In 1884 the War Office Authorities gave instructions that each regimental district should keep a register for assisting reservists and discharged soldiers to find employment; and a small subsidy was soon afterwards granted to the National Association.

Meeting of railway representatives.

In 1892 a meeting of representatives of the principal railway companies took place at the War Office, under the presidency of the Under Secretary for War, when the question of employing more soldiers and sailors was discussed. Very useful and gratifying action was afterwards taken by some of the great companies, whose co-operation had thus been invited.

The Enlistment Scheme.

Meanwhile, in 1891, the Postmaster General introduced a system having a most important bearing on the problem of finding State employment for reserve and discharged soldiers.

With the sanction of the Treasury he made a regulation that telegraph messengers, in order to become postmen, should first serve for five years with the colours. At the age of 18 they were to be encouraged to enlist, and when they returned to the Department as postmen, half their military service was to count as Post Office service for the purposes of pay. On the death of Mr. Raikes, his successor in office gave his adhesion to the same plan. The scheme, however, had only a prospective application, and was eventually abandoned before it had in fact come into operation.

Present attitude of the Post Office.

While it appears that for some years the Post Office has given employment to a certain number of ex-soldiers and sailors, it would also seem that with the exception of the proposals of 1891 referred to in the preceding paragraph the only systematic effort to employ such persons in this Department is to be found in the regulations which concede certain advantages to ex-soldiers and sailors when applying for appointment as postmen or porters in force since 1892. But these regulations expressly stipulate that telegraph messengers who have not served in the Army or Navy, and indeed any person who may be employed, even temporarily, in the Postal Department, shall enjoy precedence over ex-soldiers and sailors in the matter of selection.* It is also the case that telegraph messengers who enlist in the Army are still allowed to count half their Army service as service with the Post Office should they return to it. But these would appear to be the only aids which the Post Office gives to the Naval and Military Authorities in finding employment for ex-soldiers and sailors.

The National Association.

In 1885 the National Association for the Employment of Reserve and Discharged Soldiers was established. This organisation has its head-quarters in London, and branch or district associations in nearly every part of the country. Entirely due, in the first instance, to private enterprise, the Association has, in the last few years, received increased recognition and assistance from the State, and has exercised, your Committee believe, believe, a most beneficial influence in providing retired soldiers with employment, and in persuading the civil community to regard these servants of the State from a more just and patriotic standpoint.

* Appendix, No. 4, Memorandum by the Postmaster General.

Conclusions as to the above.

From the above historical survey of the matters under consideration, it will be seen that although occasional attempts have been made to carry out, in the spirit rather than the letter, the recommendations of the 1876–77 Committee, the State has not yet adopted any sufficient and continuous policy for the employment of reserve and discharged soldiers; the most important movement in that direction having been the result of private enterprise.

The State and the Reservists.

Your Committee regard this condition of things as much to be regretted. They believe that by annually sending some 16,000 or 17,000 reservists back from the colours into civil life, the State contracts towards these men a moral obligation which it should not hesitate to discharge. They enlist at exactly that period of their lives when they might otherwise be learning what would be most useful to them as mechanics, as craftsmen, or in other civil vocations. They have lost many opportunities for establishing connections and interest; they have saved the rest of the community from the inconvenience and hardship of universal service; and, for a small retaining fee, they have undertaken to return to military life whenever called upon*.

Reservists entitled to special favour.

Employment in different Government Departments may, to a certain extent, be looked on as employment in different capacities under one master. An employer of labour, in order to obtain the best men for his work, must very often go outside the circle of his employées, but every one will admit that they, as a rule, should have the first claim for his consideration. In the same way vacant places in Government offices should be given by preference to those who have previously served in the same or in some other Government service, though to this rule there must be exceptions more or less numerous. No one can, your Committee think, complain that the sailor and the soldier getting this amount of consideration with regard to civil employment under the Crown. The foregoing considerations, your Committee believe, make up, on behalf of the Army reservists and discharged soldiers and sailors, a claim to specially favourable treatment at the hands of the Government.

Civilians and the military calling.

As regards all soldiers, the tendency, hitherto, would seem to have been to regard them as a peculiar class of men segregated from the rest of the community; and although the short-service system, coupled with the spread of education, has done something to correct this impression, your Committee are of opinion that it would at once greatly popularise service in the Army, and improve the status of the soldier, if serving with the colours could be made, under ordinary circumstances, a condition of appointment for employment in the Departments of the public service; civilians being thus encouraged to regard military service as the avenue rather than the obstacle to civil employment under the Crown.

Regret at abandonment of the Enlistment Scheme; recommendation.

Your Committee regret that the experiment of passing a certain number of telegraph messengers through the military service appears to have been considered impracticable. They are, however, strongly of the opinion that every inducement should be held out to telegraph messengers to pass through the ranks, which hardly appears to be the case at present. The success of this recommendation must depend on the cordial co-operation of the Post Office and the War Office, and the exact steps which should be taken can hardly be indicated by your Committee. But the Committee think that in any case those telegraph messengers who have enlisted should, on passing into the reserve with good character, have the very first claim to employment, above all others.

Soldiers and sailors as policemen, &c., &c.

Returning to the more general aspect of the question, your Committee heard much evidence as to the suitability of soldiers, sailors, and marines, for employment as policemen, prison warders, caretakers, timekeepers, watchmen, storemen, &c., &c. The general testimony was strikingly favourable as to the satisfaction given by ex-soldiers and sailors in the capacities thus enumerated; and although one police witness expressed the opinion that army training tended to make a man lose his individuality to an extent which might interfere with the due discharge of the duties of a country constable,† the evidence given on behalf of the Metropolitan Police,‡ as well as the information supplied to your Committee by the other great cities, to which application was made, is unanimously favourable to the ex-soldier and sailor.§ As park-keepers, too, they appear to to give general satisfaction; and your Committee is glad to understand that this class of situation in connection with the Royal Parks, is now, practically speaking, set apart in favour of those who have served.

Handiness of ex-sailors.

The retired sailor, it would appear, gives more satisfaction than the soldier, and finds it easier to obtain civil employment, in such branches of work as building and scaffolding, or service with the Fire Brigade. The soldier, on the other hand, has very few opportunities, either of learning any new kind of work, or of keeping himself practised in what he may have been taught before joining; and your Committee would suggest that, in the winter months especially, and subject always to the paramount duty of maintaining their military efficiency, soldiers might be given some further encouragement than that which they at present enjoy in attending any courses of instruction, including those of the National Schools of Technical Education, by which they would be likely to benefit after their term of service with the colours shall be completed. Your Committee would also recommend the further and more frequent employment of soldiers in all industrial work incidental to their daily life and calling.

Recommendation.

Ex-soldiers and the police force.

To return to the question of employing ex-soldiers, more especially non commissioned officers, in the police; while anxious not to fetter the discretion of the local authorities in selecting whatever men may seem to them best fitted for the special duties they may have to perform, your Committee believe that the example of the Metropolitan Police in reserving a definite proportion of appointments for retired soldiers and sailors, might well be more generally copied. From a return supplied by the town clerks of the cities of Manchester, Liverpool, Glasgow, and Sheffield, it would appear that much is being done in those important centres in the same direction;* and your Committee are convinced that every possible means should be taken to bring to the notice of the proper local authorities, through the officers commanding regimental districts, and by all other legitimate means, the desirability of helping to solve what has become a national problem.

Ex-soldiers and sailors and private employment.

The importance of stimulating the employment of ex-soldiers and sailors in other than official capacities should be prominently kept in view; and your Committee consider that the National Association for the employment of Reserve and Discharge Soldiers, as it is at present constituted and managed, and local authorities as well a private employers should receive all possible encouragement from the State. Your Recommendation as to characters.

Committee also recommend that all necessary steps should be taken to ensure the absolute reliability of all documents purporting to be the "characters" of Reserve or Discharged Soldiers.

Unsuitability of ex-soldiers for certain kinds of work.

Your Committee heard some evidence as to the unsuitability of ex-soldiers for employment in some of the more laborious forms of manual work, and your Committee would point to the interesting and valuable evidence of the General Manager of the Great Northern Railway Company, as accurately indicating the special branches of civil employment for which soldiers are apt to prove unsuited.†

Further recommendations.

Your Committee recommend that every soldier or sailor, upon discharge or retirement to the Reserve, should be given a printed paper setting forth in plain language the civil appointments for which he is eligible, the conditions which he must fulfil, and the person or persons to whom or through whom any application of his should be made.

Recommendation as to the payment of pensions.

Your Committee heard so much as to the evils of paying pensions quarterly as to be convinced that a discontinuance of that system is needed. They recommend that, wherever it may be practicable to do so, the pay or pension of an ex-soldier or sailor shall be included in, or added to, his weekly wage, and handed to him at the same time; and they are glad to learn that this practice is already in operation in one Department of the Post Office, and that an extension of the arrangement is likely to be favourably considered and facilitated by the War Office.

Recommendations with regard to appointment in the Civil Service.

The evidence given before your Committee shows that there are many men in the Army well qualified, on leaving the colours, to perform clerical work such as is now allotted to the "abstractor" class in the public offices. It is clear, however, that in the competitive examinations upon which clerks of this class are appointed, such men compete at a disadvantage with younger men, whose education has more recently been finished, and who, in many cases, have had practice in doing examination papers. Their inferiority inferiority as competitors in an examination does not, in the opinion of competent witnesses, indicate any corresponding inferiority in education, in intelligence, or in fitness for the work of this branch of the public service. Your Committee, therefore, recommend that the experiment should be tried of reserving a certain number of appointments of this class for competition among soldiers leaving the colours, subject to the existing limit of age, which would at present apply in their case, and subject also to the successful candidates passing a standard to be determined by the Civil Service Commissioners. Your Committee are of opinion that this could be done without risk to the efficiency of the public service, and that it would be likely to increase the attractions of the Army for young men of intelligence and fair education. Your Committee believe also that the same considerations apply to the Second Division of the Civil Service, and they recommend that a small number of vacancies in the Second Division should be reserved for the competition of holders of First Class Education Certificates among themselves, as is now done in the case of boy clerks in the Government Offices under the Order of 1876. It has further been urged upon your Committee, that in the case of all appointments in the public service for which reserve soldiers are likely to apply, and for which there is a qualifying non competitive examination, the possession of a Second Class, still more of a First Class Army Education Certificate, should excuse competitors from further examination. Whether this suggestion can in practice be adopted is a question for the Civil Service Commissioners, but your Committee earnestly commend it to their consideration, and believe that, if it is found possible to adopt it, it will act as an inducement to reserve and discharged soldiers to apply for some situations for which they are well fitted.

* Appendix, No. 3.

The recommendations of 1876–77.

Further recommendations.

Lastly, your Committee recommend that the recommendations of the Select Committee, 1876–77, as regards permanent messengers, should be forthwith carried into effect; and that with regard to civil appointments for which soldiers and sailors of superior education may be suited, a definite proportion of such places should be reserved, and considerable latitude as to age, and rules as to marriage, and conditions of examination, &c., given to those who have been serving the State, at sea or with the colours.

Concluding remarks.

The Report of the Select Committee of 1876–77, made nearly 20 years ago, dealt mainly with the problem how, in finding civil employment for soldiers and sailors, that particular portion of the community might derive some benefit. But your Committee are of opinion that since that period, during which the short-service system has been fully developed, and the labour difficulty has greatly increased, the question has become a much larger one. All authorities are agreed that nothing tends so much to popularise service in the Army as a knowledge on the part of those who serve that they will not find themselves stranded and unable to find work at the end of their military career. And in view of the growing demand for higher wages, side by side with the existence of purely voluntary service, your Committee believe that the recommendations they have now made, if carried out in their integrity, will not only increase the self-respect and efficiency of the soldier, but will also be of great advantage to the State and to the country at large.

DRAFT REPORT, proposed by the Chairman, brought up, and read the first time, as follows:

Appointment of Committee.

"1. YOUR Committee was first appointed on the 13th June 1894; but on the 3rd August 1894, finding that they had not time to conclude their inquiry, they recommended being re-appointed in the Session of Parliament then next ensuing. This was accordingly done, and this Report is therefore the result of the two inquiries, 1894 and 1895.

The Select Committee of 1876-77.

"2. Dealing first with what may conveniently be called the historical part of the reference, your Committee find that the Select Committee of 1876-77 recommended, inter alia:—

"(a.) That the appointments of permanent messengers, for which 'soldiers and sailors appear especially suited,' should, for the future 'be exclusively made from persons who have served.' *

"(c.) That, in connection with the above, 'the conditions as to age and marriage should also be carefully reviewed in some cases. If, for instance, the rule, that the superior limits of age may be extended in proportion to the period of a soldier's service, applies to a particular class of civil employment, it is manifest that in such cases the rule excluding married candidates should also be relaxed.' ‡

"3. The Select Committee, in making these recommendations, desired it to be understood that, 'while mainly referring to the Army,' they also wished to recommend 'that similar advantages should be given to the marines, and also, where practicable, to sailors.' § And the Report, to which your Committee have thus referred, concludes with this paragraph:—

"'Your Committee, in conclusion, desire to express their earnest hope that the recommendations which they have made, and the evidence on which those recommendations are based, will be taken into consideration by the Departments concerned, with as little delay as possible.'

4. Nearly

Results of recommendations.

"4. Nearly 18 years have elapsed since the above was written; and several changes of Ministry have taken place during that period. But it does not appear to your Committee, after carefully inquiring into the subject, that the results have been, on the whole, at all commensurate with the necessities of the case.

War Office and Admiralty.

"5. Of the various Public Departments which have had the means of complying with the recommendations referred to, the War Office and the Admiralty have, as might have been expected, been foremost in attempting some change of policy for the benefit of soldiers and sailors.

The Treasury.

"6. The Treasury has, from time to time, taken important action in the same direction; and the civil community at large, stimulated by the action of the War Office, of the county and military authorities in the regimental districts, and of some of the great railway companies, has of late years taken up a more liberal and public-spirited attitude on this question.

Treasury Committee 1883.

"7. In 1883 the Treasury appointed a Committee, which reported in favour of employing Army and Navy pensioners in the outer and unclerical branches of the Civil Service,

And in 1891.

"8. In 1891 the same Department reported, with regard to the appointment of office-keepers, messengers, and others, in a sense favourable to retired soldiers and sailors. But until March 1894, the Treasury had only issued minutes giving their sanction, as an experiment, to the employment of Navy and Army pensioners as 'temporary messengers in Public Departments,' but expressly signifying that such employment 'would not be given exclusively to soldiers or sailors.'

War Office action in 1884.

"9. In 1884 the War Office Authorities gave instructions that each regimental district should keep a register for assisting reservists and discharged soldiers to find employment; and a small subsidy was soon afterwards granted to the National Association.

Meeting of railway representatives

"10. In 1892 a meeting of representatives of the principal railway companies took place at the War Office, under the presidency of the Under Secretary for War, when the question of employing more soldiers and sailors was discussed. Very useful and gratifying action was afterwards taken by some of the great companies, whose co-operation had thus been invited.

The Enlistment Scheme.

"11. Meanwhile, in 1891, the Postmaster General introduced a system having a most important bearing on the problem of finding State employment for reserve and discharged soldiers.

"With the sanction of the Treasury he made a regulation that telegraph messengers, in order to become postmen, should first serve for five years with the colours. At the age of 18 they were to be encouraged to enlist, and when they returned to the Department as postmen, half their military service was to count as Post Office service for the purposes of pay. On the death of Mr. Raikes, his successor in office gave his adhesion to the same plan. The scheme, however, had only a prospective application, and was eventually abandoned before it had in fact come into operation.

Present attitude of the Post Office.

"12. The only trace of any co-operation, on the part of the Post Office Department, with the Military Authorities, in giving any advantages to reservists, or discharged soldiers or sailors, in selection for Post Office employment, is to be found in the regulations in force since 1892, which concede certain advantages to such persons when applying for appointment as postmen or porters.* But these regulations expressly stipulate that telegraph messengers who have not served in the Army or Navy, and indeed any person who may be employed, even temporarily in the Postal Department, shall enjoy precedence over ex-soldiers and sailors in the matter of selection. It is also the case that telegraph messengers who enlist in the army are still allowed to count half their Army service as service with the Post Office. But these would appear to be the only remains of a policy by which the Post Office gives any deliberate assistance to the Naval and Military Authorities in finding employment for ex-soldiers and sailors.

The National Association.

"13. In 1885 the National Association for the Employment of Reserve and Discharged Soldiers was established. This organisation had its head-quarters in London, and branch or district associations in nearly every part of the country. Entirely due, in the first instance, to private enterprise, the Association has, in the last few years, received increased recognition and assistance from the War Office, and has exercised, your Committee believe, a most beneficial influence in providing retired soldiers with employment, and in persuading the civil community to regard these servants of the State from a more just and patriotic standpoint.

Conclusions as to the above.

"14. From the above historical survey of the matters under consideration, it will be seen that although occasional attempts have been made to carry out, in the spirit rather than the letter, the recommendations of the 1876-77 Committee, the State has not yet adopted any systematic and continuous policy for the employment of reserve and discharged soldiers: the only successful movement in that direction having been the result of private enterprise.

The State and the Reservists.

"15. Your Committee regard this condition of things as much to be regretted. They believe that by annually sending some 16,000 or 17,000 reservists back from the colours into civil civil life, the State contracts towards these men certain obligations which it should not hesitate to discharge. They have given their services as soldiers at exactly that period of their lives when they would otherwise be learning what would be most useful to them as mechanics, as craftsmen, or in other civil vocations. They have expended much of their strength and energy; they have lost many opportunities for establishing connections and interest; they have saved the rest of the community from the supposed inconvenience and hardship of universal service; and, for a trifling retaining fee, they have undertaken to return to military life whenever the conditions of that life become most precarious.

* Appendix, No. 4, Memorandum by the Postmaster General.

Reservists entitled to special favour.

"16. These considerations, your Committee believe, make up, on behalf of the Army reservists, a claim to specially favourable treatment at the hands of the Government.

Civilians and the military calling.

"17. As regards all soldiers, the tendency, hitherto, would seem to have been to regard them as a peculiar class of men segregated from the rest of the community; and although the short-service system, coupled with the spread of education, has done something to correct this impression, your Committee are of opinion that it would at once greatly popularise service in the Army, and improve the status of the recruits, if serving with the colours could be made a necessary condition of admission to some of the civil departments of the public service; civilians being thus encouraged to regard military service as the avenue rather than the obstacle to civil employment under the Crown.

Regret at abandonment of the Enlistment Scheme; recommendation.

"18. Your Committee regret that the experiment of passing a certain number of telegraph messengers through the military service was not given a fair trial. The alleged explanation, that the fear of seeing their sons turned into soldiers began to deter the parents of respectable lads from letting them enter the telegraph service, does not appear to your Committee to be at all satisfactory. Of course such a change of policy could hardly take place without causing temporary friction to some individuals; but your Committee believe that minor considerations such as these should not for a moment be allowed to stand before the good of the Queen's service, and they recommend that, with due regard to existing interests, the Post Office regulation making enlistment for five years a necessary preliminary to promotion from telegraph messenger to postman, should be re-enacted and allowed full scope for operation and development.

Soldiers and sailors as policemen, &c., &c.

"19. Returning to the more general aspect of the question, your Committee heard much evidence as to the suitability of soldiers, sailors, and marines, for employment as policemen, prison warders, caretakers, timekeepers, watchmen, storemen, &c., &c. The general testimony was strikingly favourable as to the satisfaction given by ex-soldiers and sailors in the capacities thus enumerated; and although one police witness expressed the opinion that Army training tended to make a man lose his individuality to an extent which might interfere with the due discharge of the duties of a country constable,* the evidence given on behalf of the Metropolitan Police,† as well as the information supplied to your Committee by the other great cities, to which application was made, is unanimously favourable to the ex-soldier and sailor.‡ As park-keepers, too, they appear to give general satisfaction; and your Committee is glad to understand that this class of situation in connection with the Royal Parks, is now, practically speaking, set apart in favour of those who have served.

Handiness of ex-sailors.

"20. The retired sailor, it would appear, gives more satisfaction than the soldier, and finds it easier to obtain civil employment in such branches of work as building and scaffolding, or service with the Fire Brigade. The soldier, on the other hand, has very few opportunities, either of learning any new kind of work, or of keeping himself practised in what he may have been taught before joining; and your Committee would suggest that, in the winter months especially, and subject always to the paramount duty of maintaining their military efficiency, soldiers might be given some further encouragement than that which they at present enjoy in attending any courses of instruction by which they would be likely to benefit after their term of service with the colours shall be completed. Your Committee would also recommend the further and more frequent employment of soldiers in all industrial work incidental to their daily life and calling.

Suggestion.

Recommendation.

Ex-soldiers and the police force.

"21. To return to the question of employing ex-soldiers, more especially non-commissioned officers, in the police; while anxious not to fetter the discretion of the local authorities in selecting whatever men may seem to them best fitted for the special duties they may have to perform, your Committee believe that the example of the Metropolitan Police in reserving a definite proportion of appointments for retired soldiers and sailors, might well be more generally copied. From a return supplied by the town clerks of the cities of Manchester, Liverpool, Glasgow, and Sheffield, it would appear that much is being done in those important centres in the same direction;§ and your Committee are convinced that every possible means should be taken to bring to the notice of the proper local authorities, through the officers commanding regimental districts, and by all other legitimate means, the desirability of helping to solve what has become a national problem.

Ex-soldiers and sailors and private employment.

"22. The importance of stimulating the employment of ex-soldiers and sailors in other than official capacities should be prominently kept in view; and your Committee believe that the National Association for the Employment of Reserve and Discharged Soldiers, as it is at present present constituted and managed, should continue to receive all possible encouragement. Your Committee also believe that steps should be taken to ensure the absolute reliability of all documents purporting to be the "characters" of Reserve or Discharged Soldiers. Characters.

"23. Your Committee heard some evidence as to the unsuitability of ex-soldiers for employment in some of the more laborious forms of manual work, and your Committee would point to the interesting and valuable evidence of the General Manager of the Great Northern Railway Company, as accurately indicating the special branches of civil employment for which soldiers are apt to prove unsuited.* Unsuitability of ex-soldiers for certain kinds of work.

"24. Your Committee heard so much as to the evils of paying pensions quarterly as to be convinced that a discontinuance of that system is needed. They recommend that, wherever it may be practicable to do so, the pay or pension of an ex-soldier or sailor shall be included in, or added to, his weekly wage, and handed to him at the same time. Recommendation as to the payment of pensions.

"25. They also recommend that every soldier or sailor, upon discharge or retirement to the reserve, should be given a printed paper setting forth in plain language the civil appointments for which he is eligible, the conditions which he must fulfil, and the person or persons to whom or through whom any application of his should be made. Further recommendations.

"26. Your Committee recommend that the recommendations of the Select Committee, 1876–77, as regards permanent messengers, should be forthwith carried into effect; and that with regard to civil appointments for which soldiers and sailors of superior education may be suited, a definite proportion of such places should be reserved, and considerable latitude as to age, and rules as to marriage, and conditions of examination, &c., given to those who have been serving the State, at sea or with the colours. The recommendations of 1876-77. Further recommendations.

"27. The Report of the Select Committee of 1876–77, made nearly 20 years ago, dealt mainly with the problem how, in finding civil employment for soldiers and sailors, that particular portion of the community might derive some benefit. But your Committee are of opinion that since that period, during which the short-service system has been fully developed, and the labour difficulty has greatly increased, the question has become a much larger one. All authorities are agreed that nothing tends so much to popularise service in the Army as a knowledge on the part of those who serve that they will not find themselves stranded and unable to find work at the end of their military career. And in view of the growing demand for higher wages, side by side with the existence of purely voluntary service, your Committee believe that the recommendations they have now made, if carried out in their integrity, will not only increase the self-respect and efficiency of the soldier, but will also be of great advantage to the State and to the country at large." Concluding remarks.

Amendment proposed, That the following New Paragraph be inserted in the Report:

"The evidence given before your Committee shows that there are many men in the Army well qualified, on leaving the colours, to perform clerical work such as is now allotted to the 'abstractor' class in the public offices. It is clear, however, that in the competition examinations upon which clerks of this class are appointed, such men compete at a disadvantage with younger men, whose education has more recently been finished, and who, in many cases, have had practice in doing examination papers. Their inferiority as competitors in an examination does not, in the opinion of competent witnesses, indicate any corresponding inferiority in education, in intelligence, or in fitness for the work of this branch of the public service. Your Committee, therefore, recommend that the experiment should be tried of reserving a certain number of appointments of this class for competition among soldiers leaving the colours, subject to the existing limit of age, which would at present apply in their case, and subject also to the successful candidates passing a standard to be determined by the Civil Service Commissioners. Your Committee are of opinion that this could be done without risk to the efficiency of the public service, and that it would be likely to increase the attractions of the Army for young men of intelligence and fair education. Your Committee believe also that the same considerations apply to the Second Division of the Civil Service, and they recommend that a small number of vacancies in the Second Division should be reserved for the competition of holders of First Class Education Certificates among themselves, as is now done in the case of boy clerks in the Government Offices under the Order of 1876. It has further been urged upon your Committee, that in the case of all appointments in the public service for which reserve soldiers are likely to apply, and for which there is a qualifying non-competitive examination, the possession of a Second Class, still more of a First Class Army Education Certificate, should excuse competitors from further examination. Whether this suggestion can in practice be adopted is a question for the Civil Service Commissioners, but your Committee earnestly commend it to their consideration, and believe that, if it is found possible to adopt it, it will act as an inducement to reserve and discharged soldiers to apply for some situations for which they are well fitted"—(Mr. Benson).—Question, That this paragraph be inserted in the Report,—put, and agreed to.

Paragraph 27, amended, and agreed to.

Paragraph 28, agreed to.

Viscount Wolmer.
Mr. Woodall.

SIR GEORGE CHESNEY IN THE CHAIR.

Sir HENRY OAKLEY, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

1. YOU are, I believe, the General Manager of the Great Northern Railway?—Yes.

2. You also, I think, represent the Railway Association?—Yes, I am honorary secretary of the Railway Association.

3. Therefore, you are enabled to speak pretty generally as to the views of the companies?—Yes. Of course I cannot speak from a detailed knowledge of what is happening on other lines, but I can speak generally the views of the railway companies with regard to this subject.

4. You are aware that the subject which we are engaged upon is the question of the employment of discharged soldiers and sailors?—Yes.

5. And with regard to soldiers, not merely old soldiers who have served for a pension, who are now quite an exception to the rule, but soldiers who after a short service in the ranks are transferred to the Army Reserve?—Yes.

6. The number of these soldiers now is about from 18,000 to 20,000 a year, who are so transferrred to the Reserves, and representations have been made in a great many quarters that they find great difficulty in obtaining employment; they have been removed from civil life during the critical six years of youth when other labourers are establishing an interest for themselves in the labour market; they came in as strangers, and have had no skilled instruction, and therefore they are placed at a great disadvantage. We have understood that some large employers of labour, sympathising with their position, find means of employing discharged soldiers, Reserve soldiers that is to say, to a very large extent, and we understand that you have taken rather an active part in this movement?—That is so.

7. You have been already, I believe, in communication with the War Office authorities?—Yes.

Chairman—continued.

8. And especially with the late Mr. Stanhope, when he was Secretary of State for War?—Yes.

9. Will you kindly give an outline of what has been done in this matter, so far as you are concerned?—We, the Great Northern Company, have employed short-service soldiers since the year 1870. We took them in limited numbers. There was then no general question raised of their employment, and no records were kept up to 1890 of the number of men which we had in our service. They were treated as ordinary applicants, and no record was kept of whether they were discharged soldiers or not. But from 1890 we have had a large number of applicants, out of whom we have selected a certain number. You will quite understand that we cannot employ a very large number at any one place, because they have to leave to join their colours for a month or so, and therefore we can only take a certain percentage of the staff at any particular station, so that we might avoid disturbing the work during the time those men had to join their regiment, or at all events join for their training. Therefore, we have spread them, more or less, all over the line. Up to May 1890, we had 301. In the year 1890 we appointed 64; that was the first time when the question was brought prominently forward. In 1891 we took 200; up to May 1892, we took 37; that is for the four months; and up to the end of June 1894 we had 250 more. So that we have appointed, from 1890 to 1894, 551 men. Well, the history of the men, and the results of their appointment, practically works out in this way. The reports I have from our district agents, men who look after after from 70 to 100 miles of railway, I will give you presently; but, dealing with the figures first, I find that a certain number declined to join; that is to say, they did not like going into the country, or for some reasons of their own; or they might have got better berths; 45 of them declined to join.

Colonel Lockwood.

10. After appointment?—Yes. Then another certain number resigned; you may take those practically as about 120. They resigned after having served on an average 119 days. The longest time that any man who resigned served was 379 days. We knew from information which the men gave us that they had got better berths; that they had become caretakers, for example, caretakers of board schools, for which they are certainly eminently suitable. Then there were dismissed for misconduct of one sort and another, about 40.

Chairman.

11. From first to last?—From first to last. The dismissals were of these classes: Under the influence of drink; drunk and asleep on duty; out of the whole lot dismissed they numbered five; absent without leave (one unlucky fellow was imprisoned; he got locked up because he was drunk), there were about five. Then there were sundry others dismissed for misconduct, general neglect, leaving without giving notice, refusing to take duty as ordered, immoral conduct, or general irregularities; those classes of offences made up the difference between those who were dismissed for being drunk, or being in drink, or absent without leave. Then I sent to all our districts to ascertain what the views of the men who were their immediate superiors were as to how these men shaped to the work of railways; and if you will allow me I will read you some of the answers: King's Cross, Passenger Department.—"With occasional exceptions the men are smart, trustworthy, and discharge their duties satisfactorily." In the Parcels Department they are said to be "useful steady men, quite as careful and intelligent as other men." In the Police Department the report is that the men "are somewhat given to malingering, and with a tendency to drink, but if they get over the first 12 or 18 months' railway service they make useful men." Our man at High Barnet says: they are "smart, careful, intelligent, and steady, make good railway men." At Wood Green, which is another station about six miles out, they are said to be "intelligent, but require a deal of looking after." Then at Hatfield the report is that they are "steady, careful, intelligent, and good servants; do their work satisfactorily." Then at Luton our man says, they are "not altogether suitable, shirk work, some are careful and steady, intelligent," and he adds, "but know too much."

Colonel Lockwood.

12. Old soldiers?—Yes, the report from Peterborough says that they are "very good men," and advocates "their employment as railway servants." Our Grantham man says they are "smart, intelligent, and accustomed to discipline, good class of men for railway servants."

Captain Bethell.

13. Are these the station-masters reports?—The stationmasters or the district agents, the men who have the immediate supervision of the men at the stations. At Retford we get more into the goods district, and you will see the difference in the descriptions of the men; they are said to be "not so careful, intelligent, or steady as agricultural labourers, who make the best railway men." At Doncaster the report is "fairly intelligent, some good workmen, but generally speaking not so good as agricultural labourers." In the coal department at Doncaster it is said "these men work fairly well; they are more efficient as signalmen, but are not inclined for heavy work." We have found that they do not do well in a goods shed, where they have to lift a sack of corn or anything heavy, and they do not like the hard physical work. Our Leeds agent says, "as a rule do not make good railway men," that is, for goods purposes; "do not like hard work, and some drink." The best men as soldiers are from cavalry regiments and officers' servants." Now as regards Lincolnshire, Boston says the men are "intelligent and active but not thoroughly industrious where the work is heavy and continuous"; and another agent at Lincoln says that they are "quite satisfactory, punctual, obedient, and smart." At Spalding, another Lincolnshire station, they are said to be "fairly good as porters where there is no goods work." At Melton, taking our Leicestershire stations, the report is from the district agent; therefore he covers several stations. "Where employed the duties have been performed fairly well," but they are not fond of goods work. I got that information of course for our own guidance to see whether the class of men we were employing were really such as it would be wise to continue in employment. On the whole we are satisfied with the statements; and the result of the inquiries which I have personally made leads me to the conclusion that on the whole they are as good as any other men, as well conducted, better disciplined, and, put to work that they like or will undertake, they do it as well as, or better than, the untrained men from the country; but they do not like the hard work of the goods shed, where they have to lift sacks of grain and heavy articles, and run along a platform with barrows full of goods; it is a sort of fatigue work that they do not like. On the other hand, on a platform, where they are accustomed to deal with the public, or in a signal box, where a quiet sententious sort of man is the best class to put, they do very well; and in London, where we put all the cavalry men, the fine tall fellows, and turn them into policemen, they do extremely well. Now and then one man will break out; he will meet some comrades and go and liquor up at the nearest publichouse and not come back quite in the condition he ought to be in; but, on the whole, the men are certainly, a very large percentage of them, fit for railway men, and will make good servants.

Chairman.

14. For the purposes of obtaining these men, what sort of procedure is adopted with a view of letting the Reserve soldiers know?—The War Office circulated some time ago to the headquarters quarters of all the military stations in the country where the men were discharged an intimation that if they would send notice to the nearest railway centre, say Birmingham, Manchester, London, or any of the large towns where the men were taken on, their applications should have the fairest consideration. We agreed, at a meeting of the railway companies in the year 1890, that we thought that was the best way of getting the men spread all over the country.

15. The men you have been referring to are all what would be termed railway servants, I think, not labourers?—No, not labourers; railway servants; men in uniform.

16. Have you any information as regards the number of labourers who are also soldiers?—No, I should not get that; I should not know that, because they would be taken on by the man in charge of a yard, or whatever it might be, as he wanted extra hands. I can only speak with the knowledge of those who are selected and passed by the directors and clothed in uniform.

17. You speak of occasional outbreaks of intemperance?—Yes, little outbreaks of intemperance.

18. Do you connect that in any way with the idea of Reserve pay to the men?—No.

19. That does not come under your notice?—No, and that is not alleged. They do not drink because they get their money; they drink because they meet old comrades, and they go over and have a glass, and from taking one glass they take another. It is simply the temptation. We do not assert, and really cannot connect, the receipt of their quarterly payments with their outbreaks at all.

20. In giving us those details of the number of men who have been failures, have you compared that proportion at all with the proportion of civilian servants who are failures?—Yes; it is rather a greater proportion than the ordinary civilian servants; but then I should say that we take the men preferably from the country, young men beginning life. The railway pay is better than they get in the country districts; and though some of them, if they are sent to a big town, do not like the smoke and dirt, and leave, still they feel that they have improved their position, and are more desirous to stay than to leave; there is not so much recklessness about them.

21. That is civilians?—Yes.

22. In speaking of the Great Northern Railway in particular, the number of men you have taken from first to last would be, how many?—Five hundred and fifty-one since 1890, from 1890 up to the end of June 1894.

23. Are you aware at all what has been done on other main lines of railway in this respect?—No, I did not know, of course, till I came to-day, what point you wanted information about; but I am quite sure Mr. Harrison of the London and North Western Railway, or Mr. Turner of the Midland, or Mr. Lambert of the Great Western, would be very happy to come to you and tell you their experience.

24. Supposing that every railway company were to take the same active share that you have in the matter, the total number of men employed in railways alone would be some thousands?—Yes, certainly. We thought, when we discussed it in 1890 with the War Office authorities, that probably from 1,000 to 2,000 men a year might go on the railways.

25. That would be a very sensible proportion of the whole number of men passed into the Reserve?—Yes. I daresay you have the evidence which was given at that time. There was a meeting with Lord Brownlow; if you have not got it I can give you a copy. Here is a print of the discussion at the War Office, when we were first asked to deal with this subject; Lord Brownlow was in the chair (handing in the same).

26. Do you consider that at present the agency provided for bringing these Reserve men into communication with employers of labour like yourselves is sufficient for the men to get full information of what possibilities of employment there are?—No, I do not think, speaking from our own experience, that the men come with a sufficiently well-defined character from the regiment; they come to us, to a large extent, as ordinary applicants; and if they are sound in wind, limb, and eyesight, and can read and write, and have good characters, they are taken on in turn with the others, without regard to their previous occupation; but taking the view that you put, I think that if the commanding officers, or those who have control of the men at the time of their discharge, brought them prominently forward, then the men would have a much better chance of getting selected. One of the regiments in London, one of the Guards, sent me a list of men, some two years ago, who were leaving the regiment, stating how old they were, how long they had been in the regiment, their height, and character; and we selected from that list (it was a good opportunity) a certain proportion that we felt we could take. Now, if when men are discharged a list of that sort could be sent round to the headquarters of the railway companies, it would be a very good thing, I think, for the men at all events, and it would certainly be an aid to the railway companies, because there would be the imprimatur of authority as to the character of the men.

27. My question was rather whether, so far as you are aware, the men are fully acquainted with the opportunities possibly available for them?—I could not answer that. I do not know.

28. When they come to you, or to your officials, for employment, do they come with any sort of certificate?—Yes, they always bring their discharge.

29. But they bring that of their own motion; they are not sent to you; they come of their own accord?—Yes, to a large extent. Now and then we get them sent, and if they are recommended to us from the country, we send the men passes to come up to London for examination. We examine them. As I just now said, they must be sound in wind and limb and eyesight, and we have an old army doctor to examine them, who examines them as to their physical condition and as to their eyesight. Then they are required to sign a form and show their handwriting, and then, after that, supposing they fulfil all the physical qualifications, their testimonials are read and considered. If there is any doubt about them we do not take them.

30. Then if a man is discharged, say at York, would he have to come down to London?—So far as we are concerned, he would; but if the commanding officer at York said that he had a man who was fit for railway service and desirous to enter it, we should send that man a pass to come to London.

31. You would give him a pass?—Yes, or send the colonel a pass to give him.

32. But you do not take them on on the recommendation of the local officer?—No, because we examine every man before we appoint him to what I may call the permanent service; and for obvious reasons. It would not do to take an incompetent man. A flat-footed man, for instance, will not do for a porter, because he cannot jump; a ruptured man will not do because he cannot lift a heavy weight; a short-sighted man will not do because he could not see a train, or the colour of a signal; and then, again, colour blindness would disqualify him. The men are always tested for colour blindness, so that we may be sure he can distinguish red from green. That protects us for signalling. Then long sight is necessary for a man to see the signal arm at danger at a proper distance. Every man who enters the permanent service is subjected to that sort of examination. He is not so subjected if he is only to be employed as a casual labourer; then he is only taken on, and discharged when the work is done.

Captain Bethell.

33. Have you a limit of age?—Yes, under 30; 30 is the age; but if a man has had experience which we think would make him useful we take him up to 32 or 33. They must be 5ft. 7in. in height; sound in wind, limb, and eyesight, of good character, and not exceeding 30 years of age.

Chairman.

34. Have you any figures as to the proportion of applicants from the army who are not qualified according to your standard?—No, I have no figures as to the proportion; but I daresay I could get the information if you would like to have it.

35. It would be useful, I think. And could you inform the Committee what proportion at present this number that you have of military employees bears to the whole of your staff?—A very small proportion. I should think we have 15,000 or 16,000 appointed men.

36. Of whom only 300 or 400 are soldiers?—We should not like to get more than a couple of thousand in in any case, because we should be afraid of too serious a disturbance of our work in the event of their all being called out.

37. You spoke, in the earlier part of your evidence, about the reason for distributing the men; which was, because of their liability to be called out; but, as a matter of fact, have they ever been called out?—Yes.

38. En masse?—Not to inconvenience us. Now and then I have heard that a certain station was short-handed, and have had to send a man there because two or three of the men had gone away to their drill for the year. That is the reason why we do not congregate them, or rather aggregate them. I suppose, if we employed 30 men at a station, we should not put more than two or three reserve men there.

39. But I think you were under some misapprehension in supposing that the reserve men have ever been called out, except once?—Perhaps so.

Mr. Brookfield.

40. Would it be the militia that you are thinking of, reserve men who happen to be in the militia?—It may be so; I do not know the reason, of course.

Chairman.

41. I do not think the reserve men pure and simple have to go out?—Have they not to go out every year?

42. No; that is probably a mistaken supposition about the reserve men, that they are called out annually?—Then I suppose I may be mistaken; it might have been the militia.

43. Probably it was the militia men, who are called out once a year?—No doubt. But there has been no inconvenience from it. I am simply talking about inconvenience, so far as we are concerned, resulting from the men being called out from any cause; but, at the same time, with that liability I do not think I should like to put too large a proportion of the staff of reserve men at one place, because it would create a disturbance in the work, which might inconvenience the public.

44. But in any great crisis that involved the reserves being called out I suppose generally our social arrangements would be very much upset?—That is what we feel: that if there was any crisis to bring out all the men, there would be a great many things disturbed besides those men. That is the view we have taken in connection with the horses. The Government register a certain number of our horses every year for public purposes, in the event of invasion or any serious tumult. We say, of course, that at a time like that we shall be glad to have our horses employed at something useful, because there will be no work going on.

Colonel Lockwood.

45. Your ideas of the relative value of old soldiers and civilians so agree with my own that I have no particular question to ask you; but there are one or two small questions I should like to put. You gave as a percentage of those discharged five out of the 45 as drunk and five as absent without leave?—Yes.

46. I suppose those are really, practically, the same?—I expect so.

47. Therefore, that five out of the 45 drunk means men drunk on duty, really?—Yes.

48. As to the reports of stationmasters and others that you kindly read, are any of those officials old soldiers themselves?—None.

49. Therefore we may take that as a fair account of what they think of the men; they are not prejudiced in favour of or against them?—No. Of course, some men take peculiar views, and do not like old soldiers. When I have to talk to them occasionally about the men I try to disabuse their minds of that. I say that an old soldier is at least as good as anybody else if he is a decent respectable fellow. But there are some men who have a prejudice against them

50. And now with regard to the pay; does a rustic taken from the plough and a discharged soldier both enter your service at exactly the same rates of pay?—Yes; supposing they are employed in London, they would begin at 17*s.* or 18*s.* a week for the first year, rising to 19*s.* for the second year, and to 20*s.* for the third year; then, after that, it goes by promotion. A signal man may go up to 30*s.* a week; or if a man gets to be a foreman porter he will get from 23*s.* to 27*s.*; there are plenty of chances for promotion for a steady and reliable man. And they get their clothes also.

51. There is no difference in the pay?—No, both start alike.

Chairman.

52. No reduction is made for reserve pay?—No.

Captain Bethell.

53. I rather understood that there was an association which professed to send men and give the characters of men to various employers; do you know anything about it?—There is such an association in London, I know, because I happen to have got my house servant from them.

54. But I understand that they do not send in to you names of men who have come upon their list; we rather understood from the evidence we had last session that this association ascertained the characters of the men, inquired into them generally, and then submitted lists to various employers?—I do not think they send to us; at least I have not seen them. They have done so to me privately, because they have found me a man once or twice for my own private purposes.

55. Have you got any sailors employed so far as you know?—No, we are rather out of the water way. The London and South Western, or the London Brighton and South Coast, or the Great Western companies would do that.

56. You do not even have applications?—No, very few.

57. Your limit of age would rather shut them out, I suppose?—No, we should rather like sailors, they do well in the goods department; they are handy men, they can turn their hands to anything.

58. I mean to say that their first period of service does not expire until 29 or 30?—I did not know that.

59. However, they have not come under your notice; you have had no applications to speak of?—No.

60. I suppose you are obliged to have among railway servants proper strictish discipline?—Yes.

61. And in that way the soldiers do prove advantageous in many ways, I presume?—Yes; you may sum it up in this way: that they make very good men, except the proportion who drink.

62. It seems curious that they should fall into drink?—It is not curious; they meet some old comrades.

63. One would have thought that the young men you get in towns, in the earlier part of their lives would have had just as much temptation to take to drink?—They come in younger, and they would not have the experience of the old soldiers.

Mr. Woodall.

64. If I call your attention to the evidence of Sir John Adye, who is president of the association to which the honourable and gallant member alluded (handing the same to the Witness), I think you will see that the association has been brought under your notice?—Very likely. I had forgotten the circumstance.

Captain Grice-Hutchinson.

65. I think you said that the only thing you had to depend upon was the parchment certificate of discharge?—Probably the colonel, or captain of the company, would send in a letter also to say that he had known private so-and-so for so many years, that he had been in his company, and was a man of very good character, never sick, and so on.

66. Do you get any letters of that kind from the commanding officers at all?—Yes, now and then. They are generally about the cavalry men, the London men, those men in immediate touch with us; especially the men I was alluding to as policemen.

67. I suppose that any recommendation of that kind would strengthen an application?—Certainly.

68. Do you apply to the regimental districts at all for these men?—No, I do not think we apply to anybody. The letter referred to by Mr. Woodall from Sir John Adye was, I think, in reply to a letter from me.

69. There are such facilities, I believe, as register books, kept at the various depôts; you do not make any use of them?—We never have any lack of candidates. The men come every week on Tuesday for examination, and they are examined, and passed by the directors on Thursday. Every man passes before the directors, who look at his character and see the style of man he is before he is appointed to what we call the establishment for service.

70. When you said that if you employed too many of these men there might be disturbance and a certain amount of disquiet, were you referring to the trades unions at all?—No, I did not mean it in that sense. Supposing we appointed an undue proportion of these men at any one place, if they were called out the work at that place would be disturbed. That is the sense in which I used the expression.

71. You have never had any objections raised on the part of the Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants, for instance?—We should not notice it if we had; but we have had none.

Mr. Brookfield.

72 When railway servants began their day's work and go to their allotted task, are they paraded in any way, or do they all go singly?—They go singly; but their time of arrival is entered by the foreman or inspector on duty; he is, in fact, one may term it, a sergeant to see the men whom he has to control when they come on duty.

73. Does he form them up in line and look at them?—

them?—No, they march in. Supposing they are in the yard as shunters or in the goods sheds for unloading trucks, or any work of that description, there is a foreman appointed over them, who sees them and enters in his book daily the time each man comes and the time he leaves. In large stations, like King's Cross, there is an office through which all the men go, where they give their names, and the clerk posts their name, and looks at the clock to see what time they come.

Colonel Murray.

74. Do you find that any of the retired soldiers who come to you have any special qualifications for railway work (such as a signal man) beyond the hard manual work?—No, railway work is a speciality; some of them acquire it very rapidly. For instance, if you take a signal man, a man will serve as a porter for a few months and then apply to be made a signal man. Then the course is this: he is sent to a depôt to learn signalling, and the electric telegraph; he is paid his wages during the time he is there; and we say he ought to be able to learn it in three weeks or a month. At the end of that time he is examined. If he has acquired sufficient knowledge he is sent to a signal box with an old hand, and the old hand teaches the young one the practical work of signalling the line. Then as soon as it is reported that he knows it theoretically and practically, he is put to a small signal box on a branch.

75. And the labourer and the soldier start on equal lines?—Precisely.

76. But, perhaps, the soldier is rather handicapped as compared with a man who is brought up on a railway from a boy, who has advantages?—Yes, of course.

77. Then my point is this: would it be any advantage that the soldier should have learnt something during his service which would give him a special qualification?—Of course it would; he would be so far forward in his education when he came.

78. Now I would ask, what are the particular points that he could learn during his soldier's service that would give him an advantage on starting?—Only the familiarity of railway work in the yard.

79. And signalling, perhaps?—Yes, that is to say, the working of the electric telegraph.

80. That would be possible?—Yes, that would be a great advantage, no doubt. It would give a man a start, certainly, and it would put him before any entirely uneducated man.

81. Or are there any further advantages in such education at all, say for a signalman?—A signalman, as I said just now, requires to be a particular class of man. You do not want a very active-minded man for a signalman; you want a quiet sententious sort of fellow who will do nothing but think of his signals. If he begins to dream he is very apt to neglect his signals. Signalmen are a highly respectable set of men, and the most reliable men, I should think, in any service in the world.

82. And would any points of personal character of that kind which were mentioned in the character that the commanding officer gives, be an advantage?—No doubt. But a man would not be put on as a signalman, or taught signalling, when he first came; he would have to get accustomed to railway working, and to know the difference between different classes of trains; because the signalman has to define to the man he advises, not only that a train is coming, but what class of train it is: whether it is a fast goods, or a slow goods train, a cattle train, a fast passenger express, or a slow passenger train. He would have to be accustomed to railway work before he would be fit to take the initial step of learning the theory of signalling.

83. Might I ask one other question; if he knew anything about book-keeping, would he start with better advantages on the railway?—Undoubtedly, because he then probably, supposing he was put in a goods shed, would make a checker very soon. A checker is a man who enters briefly the goods that arrive in a truck, or the goods loaded in a truck. Suppose it is truck No. 10,000, and there is a bale for Johnson, another for Smith, and a parcel for Jones, and so on; there is a man who stands at the mouth of the truck, who makes a record at the time. Now an educated man does that well directly, and then he gets forward to 23*s.* or 24*s.* a week.

84. A small knowledge of book-keeping would be an advantage to him, then?—Yes.

Captain Fenwick.

85. The numbers that you have given us refers solely to reservists, I think, and not to pensioners?—I am afraid I do not know.

86. Only to men receiving reserve pay, I mean, or chiefly?—I do not think I could answer that. The pensioners would be more than 30 years of age, would they not?

87. Yes?—Then distinctly they are reservists.

88. From what branches of the service do you find the best men for railway servants come; have you noticed that at all, whether it is from cavalry, or infantry, or artillery?—Yes. The cavalry-men are better men on platforms, and where they have to deal personally with the public. The big men, I must explain, we make policemen of.

89. And as a large employer of reservists you would like to see the characters given to the soldiers on their discharge more definite and not so general as those given now?—That might of course, to some extent, interfere with your military regulations.

90. But if it was possible, you would like to see more definite characters given?—Yes. What we should like to see would be a character from somebody who knows the man, and not simply a character given officially from the regiment.

91. And from what you have seen of the soldiers in your employ, do you think that they would be fit to obtain their fair proportion of promotion?—Undoubtedly. I should think of the men who stay the soldier would get a better share of promotion.

Mr. Benson.

92. Do I correctly understand that you do not take on any men over 30 years of age?—Yes, unless he has had some special knowledge of railway work, or of something specially required quired in railway work; for instance, a man accustomed to the telegraph, and who had given a couple of years to it; but, ordinarily speaking, if he was an uneducated man from any class we should not take him if he was more than 30.

Viscount Wolmer.

93. Do you get many applications from reservists who have not learnt anything of railway service, who have been artizans?—No, I think not.

94. Anyhow, they do not say whether they have been so?—They do not state that.

Chairman.

95. I gather that you do not get any soldiers for your clerical establishment?—Not unless they show adaptability such as I have explained. They start as checkers, and then they may get to be invoice clerks, but I do not think any large proportion of them.

Chairman—continued.

Colonel Murray.

96. Is there any trade which would be an advantage to the soldier in railway work?—No, I think not. The railway man is a class by himself; it requires a special knowledge, and, you may put it more than that, a knowledge of his district as well; for instance, a man in a coal district would have an entirely different class of work from a man in a manufacturing district; and, again, in an agricultural district he would only see grain, potatoes, heavy mangolds, and all that class of work, in and out. In a manufacturing district he would have bales and cases of goods condensed, and more or less valuable. In a coal district, of course, he could only have coal.

Mr. John Steele; Examined.

Chairman.

97. You are, I believe, Chief Inspector of the Excise Department?—Yes.

98. You will perhaps be able to tell us to what extent your department affords an opening for the employment of discharged soldiers; by discharged soldiers I mean not pensioners, but young men who are transferred to the Reserve on the completion of a few years' service with the Colours?—What would be the ages at which they would be discharged, may I ask?

99. About 26?—You see that age is above the maximum age, which is 22, at which we allow young men to come into the department.

100. Perhaps you will first explain to the Committee what is the class of employment that your department embraces for uneducated people?—We have, of course, work in connection with charging spirit duties, beer duties, and licences throughout the country.

101. All over the country?—All over the country; England, Scotland, and Ireland.

102. What is the total strength of your establishment?—Very nearly 4,000.

103. That includes Ireland and Scotland?—It includes Ireland, Scotland, and England.

104. Not the Channel Islands?—No, not the Channel Islands; the Customs have to do with the Channel Islands.

105. Do the men enter on a regular scale and rise in the department?—Yes.

106. Do they all enter at the bottom?—They all enter at the bottom.

107. At what rate of pay do they enter?—They begin at 50*l.* a year.

108. What is a man called when he enters your department?—He is called an assistant of Excise.

109. And he gets about 1*l.* a week?—He gets about 1*l.* a week; but I may explain that in addition to that he has what we call an officiating allowance. When he is employed officiating for, say, a sick officer, or an officer on leave, he gets 2*s.* a day.

110. But ordinarily, if he is acting in his own capacity, he gets 50*l.* a year?—He simply gets

Chairman—continued.

50*l.* a year; that is what we call the commencing salary.

111. Is it paid quarterly or monthly?—Monthly.

112. Does he get any quarters, or any other allowance?—No, he gets no allowances beyond that when he is officiating.

113. He finds his own accommodation?—Yes.

114. Where is the appointment made; in London, or how?—For an appointment, of course, he has to compete before the Civil Service Commissioners; and, if he is successful, then we put him on a course of instruction at a distillery, according to the particular part of the country in which he is. We take the nearest distillery, and allow him to go through its course, which is a short course of six weeks, so as to familiarise himself with the ordinary details.

115. Is the competition held in London?—The competition is held in various parts, London, Edinburgh, Dublin, Glasgow, and other places.

116. But the same test is applied to all?—Yes, the same test is applied to all.

117. That is to say, the examination is arranged for in London?—It is held on one particular day.

118. Is the same examination sent to all the out-stations?—Yes.

119. And the competition is absolutely open to the public?—The competition is absolutely open to the public.

120. What is the limit of age for a competitor?—They cannot compete before 19, or after 22, years of age; it used to be 25 until a few years ago.

121. When a man has gained a place in your department, a junior servant does not, of course, act independently; he is working in some respects under rules and discipline, and under the supervision of others, I imagine?—Generally in the first instance, after he has gone through his course of instruction, an officer may be absent on sick leave or private leave, and he may take his place. We have a supervisor who controls so many officers, and of course course, when this assistant is doing an officer's business, he is controlled by that supervisor, who is a superior officer.

122. And the total establishment, you say, is about 3,000?—Nearly 4,000.

123. How many vacancies in a year do you have, on an average?—It depends on circumstances. You might take an average, perhaps, of 80.

124. And how often are the competitive tests held in a year?—At present once a year, in May.

125. And up to what point can a man rise in the Service?—He may rise to be deputy chairman, with 1,500*l.* a year, and secretary at 1,200*l.*

126. But, as a matter of fact, would a man entering this lower grade rise to that?—Yes, we have had recently a deputy chairman from the ranks. I passed through all the grades myself, and my salary is 1,000*l.* a year.

127. Besides this department, which is a specially educated and skilled department, have you any establishment of subordinates employed in the department?—We have mere office keepers; we have what we call coalporters in Somerset House, and we have office keepers, caretakers of offices. We have preventive men, but very few of them. Beyond those, all our men pass through the ordinary tests, and are educated men who have to learn the practical work from the beginning upwards.

128. Then, as I understand, you have really no opening for the employment of a discharged soldier who has reached the age of 24 years, and who might not be able to pass any competitive examination?—We have scarcely any. The nearest that we have to that is preventive men, who are employed wholly in Scotland, and they have to pass a simple examination; but there are only 17 of them altogether; they merely walk about with the officers to detect smuggling amongst the hills in the Highlands. I may say that we employ Navy pensioners to a very small extent, some 18 of them; and those are mostly coalporters; there are some 13 of those coalporters. There are three Army pensioners: one is a messenger at the head office, and two are messengers at Edinburgh. We have two police porters, a messenger at Liverpool, and a watchman at one of our warehouses. These are all we employ of pensioners.

129. I am afraid, then, that our Committee will find very little opening in the Excise Department?—I am afraid so.

Captain Grice-Hutchinson.

130. I suppose if there was an alteration in the rules of age, say, that a reservist could be admitted up to 26, then a man who came in and got an appointment by competition would run a chance with the rest?—Yes.

131. The only bar is the limit of age?—Yes.

Mr. Benson.

132. In some departments of the Civil Service, I think soldiers have this privilege: that where there is a maximum of age for competitors, a soldier is allowed, I think, to deduct his years of service from his age; so that, for instance, supposing the normal limit of age for competitors to be 22, a man who had served six years in the Army would be allowed to enter up to the age of 28; that does not apply to your department, I gather?—It does not apply to our department.

Mr. Benson—continued.

133. Would there be any insuperable objection to the same allowance being made in your case?—We like to get a man young, comparatively young, because we have technical and chemical processes to superintend; and I am afraid that the older we get a man in the less use he would be to us. We have very technical work in connection with brewing and distilling.

Colonel Murray.

134. You said that there were three men who had been in the Army, I think?—Yes, three pensioners; there is one of them at the head office, who is a messenger at Somerset House, and two at Edinburgh.

135. Do you happen to know whether they went under a Civil Service examination, or would they not go through that examination for that post?—I am not certain.

136. That would not be required?—Yes, it would for a messenger; all messengers go through it.

137. Then those men, I should suppose, were allowed to count their service in the Army, as they were allowed that amount of time, and allowed to enter at a later date than a civilian?—But the limit for messengers is from 21 to 35.

138. There is a further limit, then, than in the other case?—Yes, our limit for officers is from 19 to 22; but for messengers, which these men were selected for, it is 21 to 35.

139. Could you say how many messengers are employed, roughly; whether there would be more openings for soldiers in that line?—There are a few in Somerset House and a few outside, but very few. We have 33 messengers.

140. That is a fair number, and they can compete up to the age of 35?—Yes.

141. And the habits of discipline of soldiers would be an advantage in that position, would they not?—Yes, it would be advantageous, there is no doubt. I have seen these men, and I certainly have been always satisfied with them.

142. And these are the chief openings in your department, probably for soldiers and pensioners?—Yes, seeing that the age limit is so wide, up to 35.

143. Is there any appointment that you happen to think of besides that would be open to them?—I thought your Committee would deal perhaps with pensioners, so I took out a list of our caretakers through the country, and I find that we have fully 100 of them. I may explain that these are caretakers of offices. They have perhaps, according to the locality, two rooms, three rooms, or perhaps four, and sometimes five, according to the importance of the place. These rooms are valued perhaps at 18*l.* or 16*l.*, and sometimes as high as 20*l.*, or even more. They get, in addition to that, sums varying from a few shillings up to 12*s.* or 1*l.*, according to the importance of the office, for keeping it as caretakers. Now I thought that if you had pensioners in these these localities as there is no limit of age for entrance there, and they are merely appointed by the board, possibly in those cases you might find what I might call a sort of home, as it were, for some of these men.

144. And a position of trust?—Yes.

145. Might I ask why you mention the word "pensioners" in connection with that appointment?—Because your ordinary men would not get enough salary there to live upon; but I assume that in the case of pensioners they would have so much money, and what we give them would be, as it were, a help.

146. I did not quite hear what amount you said they did get?—The amounts vary; some of them are very small and some large (handing a Return to the honourable Member).

147. The amount varies, I see, from 2*s.* up to 22*s.* 6*d.*?—Yes. But what I mean is that a pensioner would have a small amount, and he would get free rooms, and in addition to that, get a little sum for keeping the offices.

148. That would not be enough for a soldier who has not any pension to live upon?—No.

149. But for a reserve soldier who has 6*d.* a day, it might do?—Yes, it might be useful to him.

150. You mentioned that there were 100 of them?—Yes, just about 100.

Chairman.

151. Could you put in this paper?—Certainly, if you wish it.

Major-General EDWARD ROBERT FESTING, F.R.S., called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

152 WILL you state to the Committee what is your official position at South Kensington?—I am Director of the Science Museum, and I also have charge of all the work that is done there in the workshops, and of all the men who are employed in cleaning, ventilation, heating apparatus, electrical apparatus, and everything of that kind.

153. What is the strength of the establishment under your orders?—It varies a little, but substantially I think I may say 50 artizans and 100 labourers. Of course I am speaking now of the works, not of the museum. In the museum in my part, we have about 35 attendants; and in the two sides of the museum, science and art together, I think we have something like 78. I could give you the exact number, if you like, of attendants.

154. Over 200 people altogether?—Yes.

155. But out of those, how many are persons who do not require a skilled technical training?—The 100 labourers require no technical training, except of course in this way, that among those 100 men whom we class as labourers there are a certain number of men who have to do scaffolding and that sort of thing, which requires rather more skill than the ordinary man possesses.

156. The question, as you are aware, that we are considering is how far the employment of discharged soldiers, not pensioners, but discharged soldiers and sailors, can be further promoted?—Yes.

157. And amongst other establishments which we thought might possibly create facilities for the employment of soldiers and sailors was the department of which you have charge?—Yes.

158. You speak of a certain amount of skill being required for scaffolding; is not that precisely the sort of work for which sailors are competent?—Yes, and it is sailors that we generally get for that. I have 12 sailors at present, that is to say, 12 men from the Royal Navy; I have got a few men who have served in the mercantile marine as well; but whenever we want a man who is handy at getting about roofs and that sort of thing, I look through my list of applicants and see if I have a sailor who will suit.

159. Are you in communication with the agency for finding employment for soldiers?—I actually am not. I have often thought of it, but the fact of the matter is that so many soldiers come to me that I have, I suppose, some hundreds of names down; and therefore I generally have somebody whom I have seen, and could send for. But I have often thought that I would tell soldiers not to come to me any more, and that I would go straight to the society.

160. When a soldier comes to you he brings merely, I suppose, his regimental discharge certificate?—In the large bulk of cases they bring characters from the officer commanding their company or the adjutant, or sometimes from the commanding officer.

161. A character special to them?—Yes.

162. Does it occur to you to be possible, or would it affect your establishment, if you were to make a rule that you would fill it entirely with soldiers and sailors. Would that work?—I do not think I should quite like to go so far as that. As an actual fact I have now got 37 men who have been soldiers, and 12 sailors; but of the former 11 are artizans. Roughly, you may say I have got of soldiers and sailors nearly one-third; I have got 49 soldiers and sailors out of 150 men.

163. Supposing that there was any agency available at which you could ascertain the qualifications of soldier applicants, do not you think that out of the large number of men discharged from the Army there would be that small number of artizans available, say from the artillery and engineers?—We do not always get the men that we want even from the Royal Engineers, as men to work in our workshops. They have not been accustomed to the sort of cabinet-making work that we have to do there.

164. But still, as a rule, you are dependent now for finding applicants upon men who come to you direct?—Yes; and of course this is the sort of thing that often happens: A man who has been with me brings an old comrade of his to get him taken. I have had several such cases; and of course if a man is a good man and brings a comrade I look upon that as rather a good recommendation, and I generally find it so.

165. Still there are now many thousand men discharged every year, and only a few of those probably are aware of the possibility of getting employment with you?—No doubt.

166. Supposing there were a satisfactory agency for bringing a department like yours into communication with discharged soldiers, do you not think it would be possible to get almost every kind of man you want in a general way, I do not mean to draw a hard-and-fast line?—I do not think I could always get the artizans I want. No doubt for the labourers I could get all I wanted.

167. Yours being a Government establishment, and the soldier having a very strong claim upon the Government to do the best it can for him while he is still in the service, do you see any strong objection to all your labourers being taken from the ranks of discharged soldiers, if the right men are forthcoming?—If the right men are forthcoming, and if I have a perfectly free hand to discharge them as I discharge my men now, I should not object. Now the men join and are taken on according to trade union rules, they are well paid, and I can discharge them at a moment's notice without saying anything to anybody.

168. That would go without saying?—Then there is one other thing. I have, at the present moment, a dozen men beyond my ordinary strength, partly because I have a great deal of work to do, and partly because I have got several men ill; and, you see, taking on men in that sort of way gives one an opportunity of selecting a good man or two to keep on what is practically the permanent staff. And in that way, of course, if one simply tied oneself down to take soldiers from an association, one could not always, perhaps, be quite so sure of getting exactly the man one wants. You see what I mean; I would rather not be bound by too hard-and-fast lines, that is all.

169. You have had, of course, good opportunities of judging between two classes of men, the men who have been in the Army and the men who have not; how do the former strike you with regard to conduct and general reliableness?—We have found that the men we have had from the Army have been very good men as a rule. It is no use blinking the fact that the soldier does often drink, but I do not think I have had more trouble from drunkenness among soldiers than among civilians. I have had a few cases. I had to get rid of one excellent workman who had been a soldier, because he drank; but there have been very few instances. I do not think I have got rid of two from that cause in the last 20 years.

170. You are aware that there are a large number of total abstainers in the ranks of the Army now?—Yes.

171. I gather that the employment in your department is of a fairly durable kind; I see that the number you keep there from year to year is pretty nearly the same?—It varies; every now and then I may have to take on five, six, or 10 men extra, as I have at this moment, but then a number remain very constant.

172. But, in a general way, it is a desirable employment for a man to get, because it is so certain?—It is. Except that there is no pension attached to it, it is generally permanent, as long as a man behaves himself.

Chairman—continued.

173. What does a man begin upon, say a labourer, in your department?—6½*d.* per hour, the trade union rate.

174. How many hours is he employed?—He works 52½ hours a week. Sometimes he may have to do an hour or two more, but 52½ hours is the regular time.

175. And he gets about 25*s.* a week?—28*s.* 6*d.*

Captain Bethell.

176. Have you had anything to do with any naval pensioners or naval men?—Yes, I have had 12 men from the Royal Navy, three of whom were pensioners.

177. Do you know at all whether the others were men who had had their discharge at the expiry of their first term of service?—Yes, men who had taken their discharge.

178. Do they do their duties adequately?—They are very good indeed; we find them handy men. My foreman at the shops says he must have a certain number of them to do work about the roofs, and that kind of thing.

179. How do you get them?—They come to me.

180. Nobody sends you their names?—No, they come to me and apply. I have a great number of names down now.

181. Naval men?—Yes, as well as soldiers.

182. When they come to you, do they bring merely their service certificates, or do they bring a character?—They often bring a private character as well.

183. So far as you can recall, without exception have they been satisfactory?—So far as I can recollect I do not think we have ever had an unsatisfactory man from the Navy.

Mr. Benson.

184. You have a number of men standing about in the rooms of the Museum, keeping watch over things and directing visitors about, have you not?—Those are policemen, the police do that duty at our Museum; and we also employ a certain number of men who are pensioners from the police, who look after the entrances and doorways, and so on. Our attendants we do not keep to show people about, but to do the work of the place.

185. So far as you know, would there be the same kind of employment in the British Museum as in yours?—I should think it would be very much of the same character. I believe that the British Museum do not take on their men in quite the same way as we do. They have a certain establishment of labourers, but they also have a considerable number of labourers whom they nominally get through a contractor, I believe; but I cannot speak positively about that, of course.

Colonel Murray.

186. You have 36 ex-soldiers, I think you said?—Thirty-seven ex-soldiers, and 12 ex-sailors.

187. Can you say whether they are reserve men, or men who have gone through the whole of their service?—A good many of them are reserve reserve men. There are only about eight or nine I think who were actual pensioners when they first came to us.

188. There are three classes of ex-soldiers: There is the reserve man who has gone through seven years or so with the colours; then there is the man who has gone through 12 years; that is to say, his regular service and reserve service; and then there is the old pensioner as well?—Yes, I think there are nine of the men who were actually pensioners from the Army when they came; and as to the rest I cannot give you the exact figures, although I can easily get them for you.

189. You mentioned that the pensioners were the police mostly?—Yes.

190. Did you mean pensioned soldiers?—No, pensioners from the police. That is another class of men altogether. The pensioners from the police do what is rather more akin to police work; that is to say, they have charge of some of the doors and of the turnstiles.

191. Not necessarily having been connected with the Army?—No; they are policemen.

192. You said that 10 of those ex-soliders were artizans?—Yes (actually 11).

193. What sort of trades do they know chiefly; and what is most useful for them to know?—Two or three of them are painters; one of them is a moulder; that is to say, a plaster moulder, a maker of casts; two of them are carpenters, as we call them; that is to say, they are really cabinet makers; and we have a plumber and some fitters.

194. Do you think they come to you, as a rule, as artizans, or are they trained in the establishment?—No, these men all came from the Royal Engineers, except one, who came from a Yorkshire regiment, I think, who was a painter.

195. Have you any infantry men?—I have got 13 infantry men, five guardsmen, three cavalry men, and three Royal Artillerymen.

196. Have the infantry men any knowledge of any trade which would make them specially useful in any way?—Only this one, who is a painter.

197. Are men who come to you from the infantry rejected because of the want of any technical knowledge of a calling?—They would not be rejected; but, of course, if I had a vacancy for a carpenter I could not well put a man on who was not a carpenter.

198. Then if two men came to you, one who was a carpenter, and one who knew nothing but how to lift heavy weight, would you accept him?—That would depend upon whether there was a vacancy for a carpenter or for a labourer. The number of carpenters I can employ is pretty well fixed by the amount of work in the workshops, and the number of vacancies.

199. I want to know whether it would be an advantage for a man to come to you with a knowledge of any trade of that kind?—I do not think it would be any advantage; because you see there are probably just the same proportion of vacancies among the artizans as there are among the labourers. I have, roughly, twice as many labourers as artizans, and I have no doubt the vacancies are about twice as frequent in the one branch as in the other; therefore, one may say that the chances are two to one in favour of the man who is not an artizan; but only for that reason simply the number there are employed.

Captain Grice-Hutchinson.

200. I suppose you have any amount of applications from civilians besides those from old soldiers?—Yes; it is one of the most terrible things that happens to me to know the number of men that come to me for employment. I suppose hardly a day passes without my having to refuse one or more, and many appear to be very good men.

Colonel Murray.

201. I suppose that a great many cabinet-makers come to you?—No, they do not, very much. When a man has a trade, you see, he generally gets an introduction to a foreman. My foreman inquires, and whether he communicates with the union, or what, I do not know; but my foreman generally gets hold of artizans for me.

202. But if a soldier knew something of the art of cabinet-making, would that be any advantage to him?—If he were really a good cabinet-maker, and I had a vacancy, I should be glad to employ him; he would be as good a man as any other, of course.

Mr. Brookfield.

203. I have only one question to ask you: Are these various men whom you employ in your department mustered or paraded at the beginning of the day's work?—No, only in this way, that they all have to write their names down in a book at the door as they come in.

204. There is nothing there that would tend incidentally to keep up a man's military instincts if he was an old soldier?—No.

205. He is not marched about?—No, he is treated quite like a civilian. The only thing, as I say, is, that he has to write his name down in a book, and the time at which he comes in.

Tuesday, 26th March 1895.

MEMBERS PRESENT:

Mr. Brookfield.
Captain Grice-Hutchinson.
Colonel Lockwood.
Colonel Murray.
Mr. Pickersgill.
Viscount Wolmer.

SIR GEORGE CHESNEY, IN THE CHAIR.

Sir FRANCIS MOWATT, K.C.B., called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

206. I BELIEVE you are Secretary to the Treasury?—I am.

207. The Committee desire to have the benefit of your opinion in this respect. At our sittings last Session we had the benefit of getting the opinion of Mr. Gleadowe, of the Treasury, the outcome of which was that in order that effective action should be taken on the part of the Government to promote the employment of discharged soldiers and sailors, the initiative, practically, must rest with the Treasury; that is to say, with regard to the various departments, although their representatives have been anxious to assist in this movement, they all imply, or state explicitly, that they must get lead and light from the Treasury on the subject, and that although they are to a certain extent independent, still it always came round to this, that the Treasury must give the lead. As you are aware, no doubt, the question is important in this way: that under the new short-service system, which has now reached its full development, something like 14,000*l.* or 15,000*l.* soldiers are transferred every year to the Reserve. And the difficulty in their case of finding employment is that most of them have been serving abroad, and are cut off from communication with the labour market. But we have received evidence from various large employers of labour, railway companies, and others, expressing their desire to employ these men on patriotic grounds as largely as possible. Still if the Government expects to get the assistance of railway companies and other employers of labour they must set a good example themselves by employing the Reserve men as far as they can. There is, of course, a great distinction between an Army and Navy pensioner and a Reserve man. The pensioners form a very small class. They are men who have served for 21 years, and they are chiefly of a superior class, because they are almost entirely non-commissioned officers. They form a comparatively small class, for the bulk of the men retire when they are young men at the age of 25 or 26. Mr. Gleadowe gave us to understand that the Treasury, I think in February last year, issued a Minute in which they laid down certain rules for the employment of soldiers in all the departments under them who can employ them. Perhaps you will be so kind as to inform the Committee what action has followed from that Minute, if any?—The Treasury has since been in communication with the different departments as to the best way of carrying out the general principles laid down in that Minute. The Treasury was anxious to see Army and Navy pensioners engaged as messengers throughout the public service; but it was found that there were some from particular messengerships in different departments to fill up which the head of that department would prefer to select his men where he liked. We have since issued a letter to the departments laying down the course to be followed for obtaining such Army and Navy messengers as they think they can employ. It has not, however, quite taken an official form, because we only received the letters back from the different departments yesterday. They all approve of it subject to one or two small details which, I think, would not interest the Committee. The rules will shortly be these: "Any department desiring to employ a pensioner messenger will apply to the Civil Service Commission, who will arrange, in communication with the Admiralty or the War Office, as the case may be, for the supply of a qualified candidate;" I should explain that the Admiralty and the War Office say that they can supply the candidate (I am still speaking of pensioners, which is the only form in which the proposal has come before us) "with such a certificate of health, conduct, and intelligence as will make after examination unnecessary." But it was thought better that the Civil Service Commission should keep the list, otherwise there might be more applications to the War Office than to the Admiralty, and the Admiralty and the War Office will supply the Civil Service Commission with the names of as many men as there would be likely to be vacancies vacancies for in the year. When the department requiring a messenger applies to the Civil Service Commissioners, they will simply give the first from that list; that is to say, turn and turn about. Further, "The Admiralty or War Office, as the recommending department, will in each case certify to the age, health, character, and general suitability of the candidate recommended. No responsibility in this respect will therefore rest with the Civil Service Commissioners. Such pensioners as are now in regular continuous employment as temporary messengers, supplied by the Civil Service Commissioners, will continue their employment under the new regulations if they can obtain from the head of the department in which they serve certificates of satisfactory conduct." I must explain that the Civil Service Commission at present has a temporary list mainly filled by Army and Navy pensioners, and when a messenger is required for a short period in any department one of these men is supplied, say, for one or two months, and so on. Many of the men have been continuously supplied, and the rule I have just read to you is to make them now permanent messengers, having exactly the same position as new men. Again: "My Lords understand that the average number of appointments made as certificated messengers for each of the last three years is 40"; that is 40 vacancies in the year. "They desire to draw the attention of the Secretary of State in the Board of Admiralty to this fact, as a guide to the number of pensioner candidates for messengerships who should at any one time be entered upon the list of expectants. Pensioner messengers, whether heretofore or hereafter appointed, will serve under the conditions laid down in the Treasury Minute of 14th March 1894, without prejudice, however, to pensioner messengers, if any, who are now serving under conditions more favourable." That is to say, any messenger who is at present employed at a better rate will continue to receive that rate. "The number to be allowed in each department to progress to a special maximum of 24*s*. On the question whether pensioner messengers should be required to wear uniform or at least a distinctive badge," the departments have decided that they would prefer them to wear some sort of messenger uniform such as they wear at the War Office and Admiralty now. That is the summary of the arrangement come to.

Chairman—continued.

208. The departments have assented to that?—Yes: one or two have asked some questions, but not such as will at all affect the arrangements.

209. Is it intended that Army and Navy men only should be taken in as messengers, leaving out, of course, the exceptional confidential posts of the Ministers?—Yes, there was a special arrangement that men of the Irish Constabulary should be admissible, but practically that is limited to Ireland. I do not think that the number will be sufficiently large to affect the present question.

210. As soon as this has come into full working order the Army will be a source of supply for messengers in the Public Departments?—Yes, the Army and Navy, but I understand, for what reasons I do not know, that the Navy candidates are not nearly so numerous.

211. May that not be from the fact that the superior pensioners in the Navy always find employment?—That may possibly be so.

212. This matter you have now been dealing with relates to the employment of pensioners as messengers?—Yes.

213. But more or less directly under the Treasury, I think, comes the employment of the whole of the Post Office subordinates, letter-carriers, and so on; the rules relating to these are framed in harmony with the Treasury rules, I believe?—The Post Office, I believe, already employ Reserve men in large numbers, and so far as the Treasury sanction goes this would apply to porters also.

214. Has that been put upon record in the Minute in question?—The Minute has been communicated to the Post Office.

215. We had the evidence of Mr. Joyce, who is one of the leading officials in the Post Office Department, and he gave us to understand, I think, that they could employ a very large number of Reserve soldiers; but I think the Committee rather gathered that they were not sure whether the Treasury would agree to the hard-and-fast rule which would require them to look to that source mainly or entirely. Mr. Joyce stated that there was a claim on behalf of the Post Office boys to be taken on which appeared very reasonable; but, subject to that condition, we gathered that there was no reason, in the opinion of the Post Office, why the letter-carriers should not be taken from the Army. We rather gather, I think, that what they wanted was some specific authority from the Treasury. Could you say whether that has been given?—We asked the Post Office whether they were disposed to recruit their porters from the pensioner class. This is the note we received in answer: "Post Office Answer. Porters are already drawn from the Army and Navy, but, so far as concerns the Army, mainly from the Reserve and time-expired soldiers. The work requires strong and active men. Pensioners are not always suitable."

216. We were referring here not to pensioners, who are elderly men, but to young men who are discharged from the Army at the age of 26 or 27?—This is the Reserve men: "Porters are already drawn from the Army and Navy, but, so far as concerns the Army, mainly from the Reserve and time-expired soldiers," &c.

217. It does not say that they give preference of employment over the general community, but merely that they do take them?—The Postmaster General is independent in such matters. The Treasury would not feel in a position to dictate to him.

218. That is the point we wanted to bring out, whether the settlement of the question rested with the Postmaster General or the Treasury. We gather from you that it would rest with the Postmaster General?—It would rest with the Postmaster General, subject to such questions of pay and details of employment. That is purely a Treasury business.

Viscount Wolmer.

219. Was this Minute of the 14th of March 1894, founded on the report of the Committee, presided over by the late Master of the Mint?—In part, yes. The Treasury had that report before them.

220. Have we had that portion of Sir Charles Fremantle's report which affects this question in evidence?—I do not know whether you have had it in evidence.

221. Am I quite correct in saying that your Minute does not go quite so far as the recommendation of the Committee?—Would you instance the particulars to which you refer?

222. If I understand correctly, you have now issued a memorandum to the Public Departments, advising the employment of pensioners as messengers?—Yes.

223. But what about the office-keepers and attendants, other than the ordinary messengers and porters. If you turn to paragraph 4, of Sir Charles Fremantle's Committee, you will find this: "We think that such posts as gate-keepers, hall-porters, and fire-lighters should, if possible, be filled by pensioners. We desire especially to draw attention to the recommendation of Mr. Shaw Lefevre's Committee, to which reference has already been made, that the porters employed under the Post Office should be appointed exclusively from the list of pensioners. We understand that those porters who number above 500 at present about 60 are pensioners." Could you explain that matter to us?—You are not referring to office-keepers now?

224. I am referring to gate-keepers, hall-porters, and fire-lighters?—Office-keepers are a species of resident house-keepers; but hall-porters are included in the list of messengers.

225. Gate-keepers and fire-lighters would probably be the same?—Yes.

226. They are all under that generic term?—Yes.

Mr. Benson.

227. These are all covered by the term "messengers" in the circular sent out?—Yes.

Captain Bethell.

228. Office-keepers would have superior positions?—Yes.

229. And better pay?—Yes.

Viscount Wolmer.

230. Would not a retired sergeant-major be a very suitable person for an office-keeper?—I should say if he had served in the Civil Service for some time, he would. We have found it convenient, generally, to have men as office-keepers who have been for some years familiar with the service and with messenger work. I do not think it would be a desirable thing with so very small a class to ear-mark them to any particular class. I do not at all say that a pensioner would not be a perfectly suitable person, but I think it would be desirable that the head of the department should have an absolute discretion in that way, as with a small number of reserve messengers.

231. There is no reason why pensioner messengers, if the head of the department approve, should not be promoted?—Certainly not.

232. Are the porters in the Post Office, to which special reference is made, included in your memorandum?—Yes, they are; subject, as I stated, to the discretion of the Postmaster General. It has already been pointed out that there are classes which have other claims, the boys; but the Treasury has no objection to their being appointed.

233. As I understand, the porter mentioned here is not a rural postman?—No, I think not. He is a man employed about the Post Office.

234. How would the claims of telegraph boys come in, in that connection, if it is not really postal service?—It is hard on the boys. A boy who was taken on quite young, when he arrives at a certain age, 18, discharges himself by his age. There is naturally a disposition to keep the best of them on in some other capacity.

235. That point was dealt with in Mr. Joyce's evidence; I thought that applied to what you call the postal service proper, the letter carriers, sorters, and so on, and not to this class of man who is under the generic term of "porter." I do not quite understand the meaning of it?—As I understand, they are porters employed in the Post Office itself.

Captain Bethell.

236. You are speaking almost altogether of pensioners in your evidence?—Yes.

237. I understand you to say that there are not so many sailors as soldiers employed?—I cannot tell you that officially: I merely know it in conversation.

238. Can you tell me whether seamen pensioners give satisfaction, are found to be capable and satisfactory men in the performance of these duties?—So far as I know, they are only extensively employed in the Admiralty at present. The movement is new. There, I am aware, they give entire satisfaction.

239. Perhaps you would hardly be able to tell me whether the sailors who are not pensioners, but who have served their first term of service, compete for these appointments. I do not know whether your evidence goes beyond the pensioners?—My evidence has been confined to pensioners, because the other question has not been raised.

Colonel Murray.

240. There are very few pensioners nowadays; very few men serve for their pensions, and I understand from your evidence that 40 vacancies would be given in the departments annually to the pensioners as messengers. I should like to know what is understood by the Treasury by the term "pensioners"?—It has at present only been raised to us in the form of pensioners. So far as the Treasury is concerned, the reservist and the pensioner is the same thing.

241. The reservist and the pensioner come under under the same heading for these appointments?—Yes.

242. It is not only for pensioners, but for the reserve men, who have served their time with the Colours?—I can merely give you my opinion about that, because the question has not been raised officially. The proposal was that there were pensioners whom it would be desirable to obtain employment for, and this Minute was drawn to meet their case. My opinion is that the Treasury would be equally glad to see reservists employed, unless the Departments were to raise the question that the Service might be interrupted.

243. I suppose also men who are not actually reservists and are not pensioners?—We are getting a little away from the original proposition, I think.

Mr. Benson.

244. It is a year since the two Minutes were sent out to the Government Department about the appointment of porters, firelighters; I gather a considerable number of appointments of this kind must have been made since then; so far as you know have your Minutes of last year been acted upon by the different Departments?—No, as far as I am aware, not. There have been very few this year. I know extremely few, and in the early part of the year these Minutes were under discussion. You may say that it is only now that they have taken official form. The Admiralty and the War Department have appointed pensioners to all messengerships.

245. They had previously done so?—Yes, the Civil Service Commissioners have employed pensioners for their temporary list, and the whole of the temporary list employed under these Minutes have now become permanent messengers.

246. We had before us last year Mr. Lockhart, the Secretary of the Civil Service Commission, and he expressed the opinion that it might be well to reserve for discharged soldiers a certain proportion of posts in the subordinate class of the Civil Service, a class which I think are called "abstractors," the lowest department of clerks. They are admitted, I believe, by competitive examination, by which older men, such as men discharged from the Army, compete at a disadvantage. Mr. Lockhart gave us as his opinion that it would be a good thing, and in every way unobjectionable, if a certain proportion of these appointments were reserved for discharged soldiers, and competed for by them among themselves; have you any opinion you could give upon that suggestion?—I could not say that I am favourable to that. I think for clerkships you should get the best men you can, and for a clerk's work a man should start young. He is best tested by examination, and should be employed when young. I do not think that for the abstractor's work it would be desirable to begin with a man at all advanced in life.

247. The age would be in this case about 25 or 26; is that what you call advanced in life?—For that purpose I would rather see clerks begin at 17 or 18.

Chairman.

248. You are aware that in the Army a very considerable proportion of the soldiers are employed on clerical duties, and acquire very considerable facilities and experience as clerks; would it not be possible, looking to the obligation which the Government has towards its Army to find employment for its soldiers, that, provided a sufficiently high test were established, there might be a partial competition within the Army for a certain proportion of subordinate clerical appointments? Do you see any great objection on principle to that, supposing you made the test a sufficiently high one to guarantee that the persons chosen in that way should be really qualified to act as clerks?—To some extent that is done in what is called the Pensionary Clerk in the Country Department.

249. Quite so; and would it not be possible to apply that generally to the Civil Service?—Yes, it would, no doubt, be possible.

250. Supposing a man comes at the age of 26 or 27, who has already had considerable experience as a clerk (and some of the clerks in the Army, it is well known, have very difficult clerical duties which they perform extremely well, as in the Adjutant's Office, and in the Quartermaster's Office and so on), and has a sufficiently high test to ensure that he is really qualified, would there be any objection on principle to set aside a proportion of appointments to that class of man?—No doubt it could be done.

Colonel Lockwood.

251. I gather that you are not favourable to it?—I like a clerk to be a clerk.

Mr. Brookfield.

252. You mentioned the hardship on the boys of 18 in the Telegraph Service having to leave the Service and give up the prospect of promotion when he reaches that age; was not that difficulty obviated by the arrangement of making him join the colours for three years, and then return to the Telegraph Service, under the late Postmaster General, Sir James Fergusson?—He discharges himself as a boy at a certain age. Whatever he does, if he comes back again he must be re-examined as a new entrant. That, of course, he could do.

253. Your attention has not been called to the regulation; it has not come into full operation?—No, my attention has not been called to it.

26 March 1895.

Mr. HENRY LAMBERT, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

254. I BELIEVE you are General Manager of the Great Western Railway?—I am.

255. You are, I think, acquainted with the action which the War Office took in 1892, with a view to obtaining the active sympathy and co-operation of different railway companies for the greater employment of reserve soldiers?—Yes, we have taken some practical measures in that direction. From time to time we have employed discharged soldiers; but in 1892, in consequence of the conference between the War Office authorities and the railway companies, we issued a circular, of which I think you have a copy, with the notes, in which we give directions to the officers who are responsible for the appointment of men that they should, subject to the employment of lad porters, of which we have a large number, give the benefit of one out of every five vacancies to an Army reservist or discharged soldier. Those instructions have been carried out up to the present time. I think, however, I ought to say that the vacancies in the uniformed staff, for which these men alone are eligible, are not very numerous. The railway service is popular, and the men stay by us where they are at all suitable for the work. Therefore the vacancies are not so numerous as one would suppose in a large staff, more especially, as I have already indicated, as the lad porter's service is largely called upon to fill these vacancies. The men bring their sons forward, and ask us to appoint them. We feel that they have a fair claim upon us, and at the age of 14 we take on lad porters. Up to the age of 18 they are gradually learning our business, and if, at that age, they are physically capable, or otherwise are able to comply with our regulations, they are appointed. If we have to go outside them, as I have already said, for one out of every five vacancies we take steps to obtain an Army reservist. I may say that from September 1892 to the 31st December 1893 we appointed 73 men of that class, and during the year 1894 we appointed 76. In regard to the 73 I may say that 32, or 45 per cent., have left from various causes, and with regard to the 76, 28, or 30 per cent., have left.

256. The difficulty has been suggested to the Committee that if a considerable part of the staff is taken from the Army Reserve the company might be put into difficulties in consequence of the men being called out for service; are you aware that in the first place the whole of the Reserve has only been called out upon one occasion in the last 25 years, and in the next place, that although these men enter your service as reserve men, their liability to serve in the Reserve only extends to about four years on the average, so that if the man secures employment under you, at the end of four years, he is just as much at your disposal, so far as any further call is concerned, as any civil labourer?—Those considerations have been present to us, but the numbers of men that we have been able to appoint have not been such as to make them press upon us at all.

257. The number that you have taken altogether, apparently, in two years, is about 140?—One hundred and forty-nine.

Chairman—continued.

258. What proportion would that form to the number of vacancies occurring per annum?—One out of every five has been filled in that way.

259. The result would be that at the end of about 10 years you would appoint nearly 1,000 men if they all remained in your employment?—Yes, but I have already indicated the percentage of men who leave us.

260. Some possibly go to better themselves?—No doubt, but I am bound to say that some find the work too hard for them.

261. You are only referring now to what you call the uniformed men?—Precisely; excluding the artizans and all men of that class, these are men who can be employed without technical knowledge, who are taken on in the first place as porters and used in ordinary porter's work; then as they become acquainted with the line they are promoted to higher duties.

262. In the case of taking on the men you have a specific form of character, I believe?—Quite so.

263. I presume you examine them medically?—Yes, they have to pass the doctor and comply with our regulations. In point of age we do not appoint any man over 30.

264. And they must have a certain height and weight?—Yes, a certain weight.

265. You require them to be physically superior men?—Quite so. I may explain that we have sick funds, pension funds, and widows' and orphans' funds attached to the service (I am speaking now of the uniformed staff especially), and in connection with the provident funds we require them to pass a medical examination in order that they may be fit candidates for those funds.

266. Your railway goes into several seaport towns, I think?—Yes; but we find the majority of the men that we appoint in the agricultural districts. We run through a very large agricultural territory, Berkshire, Buckinghamshire, Hampshire, Dorsetshire, Devonshire, and Somersetshire. That covers a large extent of our territory, and although we run to seaports and to manufacturing districts such as South Staffordshire and South Wales we do not find that we are able, so to speak, to compete with the labour in those manufacturing districts. We get our supplies of men, to a large extent, from the agricultural districts.

267. Do you get any from the seafaring population?—We get sailors, or men who are tired of the sea and who want to come and live on shore. As a rule their work is very much harder than the work of a soldier, and we find that they take more kindly to the harder work of the railway service.

268. Would this proportion of one to five, of which you have spoken, include sailors?—No, I am speaking of soldiers only.

Captain Bethell.

269. Do you speak of sailors from the Navy, or sailors generally?—I am speaking of sailors generally; generally; but I suppose, as a matter of fact, the sailors that we put on are generally of the mercantile marine.

Chairman.

270. You do not have many applications from pensioned sailors, or sailors who have gone into the Naval Reserve?—No, we have not many men of that class applying; they are principally from the mercantile marine, as I have said.

Viscount Wolmer.

271. I see that, of the 73 men taken on in the year 1893, 21 left for various reasons of their own accord, and 11 were dismissed, and that in 1894, 28 left; are those 28 all who left of their own accord, and would they include those who were dismissed?—Yes, I think the 28 would include those who were dismissed.

272. How do you take these men; do they come to you, or do you send to the regimental district and say, "We have an opening for a man"?—The instruction is, that when the vacancy arises, the divisional officer shall communicate with the officer commanding the depôt, stating the vacancy that has arisen, and giving the description of the duties which the men required would have to perform. The instructions are fully set out in the circular.

273. He sends you the men?—Yes, he sends us the men with the forms filled up, one by the man himself, and the other by the officer.

274. You do not take the men who come to you casually?—No, I think I may say that we do not under this system, but formerly we did take men who came to us casually. We work upon the instructions which have been laid down.

Captain Bethell.

275. How many men do you employ, porters?—In the passenger and goods departments we employ about 14,000.

276. We had it in evidence from Sir Henry Oakley that the Reserve soldiers were not suitable for the goods department; is that your experience?—That is our experience.

277. The work is too hard, is it not?—Yes, that is so. There is no doubt, however, that these men, if they could get over the first 12 months they would stay with us, but as a rule they find the work, in the goods department more especially, too heavy. It is, of course, continuous work in handling heavy packages. It is also necessarily laborious work, and from their own previous experience, I suppose, they are not quite so well fitted for it, and they do not take kindly to it. If they can get over the first 12 months, as a rule they stay with us.

278. With regard to getting drunk, what is the experience of your company with reference to these men; are they worse than civilians or better?—The railway companies regard drunkenness as a very serious offence, and there is a tight supervision in respect of it; so that I think the civilians generally appreciate that more than the soldiers. Speaking generally, I should think perhaps there is a greater tendency to drunkenness on the part of a soldier than on the part of a civilian.

279. Do you employ these men in your police at all?—They are employed generally upon platforms, and the police on light duties.

280. The great railway companies have police of their own, have they not, in a sense?—The Great Western Railway Company do not have so large a police force. I think that some of the companies, indeed, I know that some of them look upon some of their signalmen as being connected with their police staff. We call them signalmen pure and simple. The police staff of the Great Western Railway Company is a very limited number indeed. It is confined principally to detective work, inquiring into losses and matters of that kind.

281. Have these soldiers proved themselves capable as signalmen?—Yes, they are suitable for that work.

282. They are trustworthy in that way?—Yes, they are amenable to discipline.

283. Do you find them more amenable to discipline than the ordinary man who has been with you for a year or two?—I do not know that I should put it very high, but I certainly do think they are more or less amenable to discipline than the general signalman.

284. You have told us that you get your men mostly from the agricultural districts?—Yes, to a large extent.

285. Do you find those men are fairly intelligent and quick?—Yes, we find the material in them answers our purpose very well.

286. They may fairly be described as intelligent folk?—Yes, certainly. Of course they have to read and write and pass an examination, and that brings them up to a certain standard.

287. Do you think they display the qualities one hears sometimes attributed to agricultural people, namely, that they are very slow in thought?—No; it is very much like when you make a man a soldier; you set him up and smarten him. In railway discipline it is very much the same thing; they are taught and educated for their duties.

Mr. Brookfield.

288. You said that formerly you used to take all the soldiers who came along casually, but that you have ceased to do so now?—Yes, that is so.

289. Did that proportion amount to one in every five?—No, there was no system of that kind. We did not take in anything like that proportion.

290. It was less than that?—Yes.

Captain Grice-Hutchinson.

291. When these men, whom you say leave your service voluntarily, do they state why they leave?—Yes, I can give you a good many reasons.

292. Do they find work for themselves?—I have the causes for their leaving. I see they are, "Do not like work"; "Continuously absent"; "Do not like work." That seems to be the general reason.

293. It is not in order to benefit themselves in other employment; they do not get another job to go to, I suppose?—I suppose they would see their way to get employment elsewhere or they would not leave.

294. Do you think there is much difficulty in these Reservists procuring employment; do they make many complaints when they apply to you for work?—We have no particular trouble with them.

295. When they do come to apply for work do they state that there is great difficulty in obtaining employment?—I have not heard of that at all, I may say that our experience has been in some instances that we applied to the commanding officer of the depôt, and he said, "I have no man eligible at the present time to send you," and then we take our ordinary course to obtain men.

296. If you want men at Reading you apply to the commanding officer at the Reading district, or if you want men at Worcester you apply to the Worcester district?—Yes, we have a list of the officers. They know where men are to be had. We write to the commanding officer, and he sends two forms of application to the railway, one filled up by the man himself, and the other by the officer.

297. Taking them all round, you are satisfied with the Reservists?—Yes, we have no feeling against them. It practically rests with themselves. If they can get over the first 12 months they get on very well.

Mr. Benson.

298. Do you suppose the number of men who do not like work means that they are deficient in muscular strength as compared with others?—It is only deficiency in will I am afraid.

Colonel Murray.

299. I think you said that the uniformed staff were the only appointments available for ex-soldiers; did I understand rightly that they were only placed in the uniformed staff?—Yes, that is so.

300. That means, I presume, that they are not appointed to book-keeping, or as clerks, or anything of that sort?—No, they are not employed in book-keeping or clerkage of any kind.

301. Is that because they are not considered suitable, or do the railway authorities consider themselves bound to take the sons of their employées as you have mentioned?—In appointing a clerk we begin with a lad clerk. Whenever a vacancy arises we fill it with a lad clerk, and these lads grow up in the service.

302. Even if a soldier came to you with qualifications as a clerk you would not think it advisable to appoint him as a clerk?—No, and in the same way with a civilian. If a civilian of 23 or 24 applies for an appointment my answer is that all the vacancies are filled by the appointment of lad clerks. That is the system we act upon. In that respect they are treated precisely as ordinary civilians.

303. Take the instance of carpenters and engineers; might not a soldier be available for these posts if he had the technical knowledge for those positions?—I have not the appointing of that class of men. That would be conducted by the locomotive superintendent, the carriage superintendent, or the engineer in charge of the permanent way. I happen to know, of my own knowledge, at Swindon, which is our head depôt, that there are men who have been in the Army; in fact we sent a man out to Chicago the year before last to look after our exhibits there. We thought he would be amenable to discipline, and very likely would be more trustworthy, so we sent him there, and he acted to our entire satisfaction.

304 The ex-soldier, with a certain amount of technical knowledge, would have a chance of being appointed to something better than hard goods work?—It would all depend upon what his qualifications were. I am quite sure that the fact of his having been a soldier would be no detriment to him. Supposing a man with a technical knowledge of carpentering were to apply at Swindon, and were to state, as he would have to do, his previous history, that he had been a soldier, it would not affect his prospects of employment at all prejudicially; it might act in the other direction.

305. The technical knowledge would be an advantage to him possibly?—Yes, it might be.

Major W. E. GILBERT, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

306. WILL you kindly state your position in the Metropolitan Police?—I am Chief Constable of the Metropolitan Police.

307. How long have you been attached to the police?—Nearly nine years.

308. Before you went into the Metropolitan Police were you in the Army, or did you hold any civil appointment?—I was chief constable of Hull, and before that I was deputy chief constable of Norfolk for three-and-a-half years.

309. You have therefore had a great deal of experience in the police service?—I have had nearly 12 years' experience.

310. What have you to say with regard to the employment of soldiers, especially soldiers from the Reserve as police?—I am not speaking now for the metropolitan police. Sir Edward Bradford is sending, I believe, Superintendent Davis of the executive branch, with a few statistics in case you should wish to ask any questions. That, however, is not my province. Speaking in my capacity, before I came here, I found that good soldiers made good policemen.

Chairman—continued.

311. In the previous police appointments which you have held, can you tell us to what extent soldiers were employed as policemen?—I had 30 out of 280 in Hull.

312. What methods did you adopt for selecting soldiers?—It would depend upon the class of men I wanted. If I wanted them to be policemen for mounted duty I should take cavalry men, for I found them as a rule the best men adapted for police work.

313. What procedure did you adopt to get hold of them?—Men would apply to me, and I always had a list of men waiting. I used to write to the commanding officers asking them if they recommended the men, and if they thought they were suitable suitable for employment in the police force. I never took a man who had a report against him for drunkenness in the Army. His character must be either exemplary or very good.

314. You say you had in the Hull police 30 out of 280?—Yes.

315. What fixed that proportion?—There the policemen had to be fire-brigade men as well, and they were wanted to look after the horses in the stables. The horses were used for mounted duty in case of disturbance, or else they were used in cases of fire. They also used to do some mounted patrol work on occasions if required.

316. Practically, your 30 men were engaged for foot duties?—Yes, they were really foot constables, but on occasions they had to be mounted.

317. Thirty was the number you required, more or less, for mounted duty?—I did not want that number. I was obliged to limit my numbers in case the Army Reserve should be called out.

318. You are aware, perhaps, in the first place, that the Government has a lien upon men entering the police force from the Reserve for only about four years; so that, of your 30 men, probably a great many would have left the Reserve, would they not?—When they did I used to take other Reserve men in their place; as their time expired in the Reserve I used to replace them with other Reserve men.

319. You do not mean 30 men who had been in the Reserve, but 30 men who were in the Reserve at the time?—I never allowed them to exceed 30.

320. Have you been put to any inconvenience owing to Reserve men being called out?—They were not called out while I was there.

321. Do you know any occasion on which they have been called out?—I rather fancy some of them were called out in 1885.

322. Are you aware that only part of the Reserve was called out then?—I was then in the Norfolk Constabulary, and we had several Army Reserve men there.

323. Were you there in 1885?—Yes.

324. Were any of your men called out then?—I think a few of them were.

325. Speaking of Norfolk, what number of men had you under your command there?—When I had charge of the county the whole police force numbered 236.

326. Out of that number, what proportion had you from the Army?—I am not quite certain as to the numbers; I think there were not more than 30 altogether. I could not say that they were all Reserve men.

327. What is your experience as to their conduct and behaviour?—My experience was that if they had been good soldiers, as a rule, they made good policemen.

328. As I gather, you only took good soldiers to begin with?—That is all.

329. May we infer that you were satisfied with the men you had?—Personally speaking, I was certainly satisfied.

330. What objection do you see to extending the employment of soldiers if you can get sufficiently good men? Supposing good men are available, what objection do you see to having a larger number than 30, apart from the liability you have mentioned to their being called out?—That would be my only objection, in case they were all taken away at one time to rejoin the colours. Putting that aside, I should not have any objection.

331. From your experience, had you any difficulty in getting soldiers, or were the applications in excess of your demand?—I could have had 500 soldiers if I had liked at any time. I had 500 on my waiting list when I left Hull, not all soldiers, but I think more than half of them were soldiers.

332. What was your standard?—Five ft. 10 in. in their bare feet, with a chest measurement of 36 inches.

333. From what branch of the Service did you get your men chiefly?—From all branches of the Service; I had more applications from cavalry men than from other branches of the Service.

334. Did you have many applications from the Guards?—I had very few applications from Guardsmen, except the Household Cavalry. I had a great many from them, and I found that they made excellent men.

335. Speaking of the Metropolitan Police, you say we shall have evidence presently upon that point. Perhaps you can give us your opinion upon the subject as regards the Metropolitan Police?—I do not know that I am quite at liberty to do that. The Chief Commissioner would be the person. I can only speak as a private individual. I could not speak officially as to their qualification. It is more a question for Sir Edward Bradford than for me.

336. Reverting for a moment to the police at Hull and Norfolk, the question of selecting and taking a certain number of men, as you did, from the Army, was entirely your own notion, there was no rule?—No. I was not interfered with in any way.

337. If your successor had thought differently, the practice might have come to an end?—Quite so; but my successor was an old officer in the Highlanders, and he followed my line exactly in that way.

338. Did you keep your register independently of anything supplied to you from the brigade depôts or regimental centres, or did you go to the regimental centres for information?—None of my applicants came from regimental centres. I had no communication from officers commanding regimental centres. I had such a large number of applicants that I did not require to open up communication with the officers.

Colonel Lockwood.

339. In the evidence of one of the chief constables given to us, he was asked the question whether the ordinary soldier was fitted for the duties of policemen, and he said, "I am afraid they are not suited for policemen's work in counties, that is to say, in the country"; do you agree with that, or do you traverse it?—I do not agree with it at all.

340. He also said, "I think the result of their training in the Army is that they cease to have any sense of responsibility in looking after themselves; they seem to lose individuality altogether; they always want somebody to be looking after them"; do you agree with that?—No, I do not.

341. Exactly the opposite has been your view?—I have found just the opposite of what that gentleman says. In my own experience I do not at all agree with that.

342. He also was asked: "You stated that you consider the employment of a man as a soldier caused him to lose his individuality, and to lose his whole sense of responsibility"; and the gentleman, who had been an officer, replied, "Certainly"; you also have not found that?—No, I have not.

343. He was further asked: "You consider that his training has had the effect of making him practically useless," to which he answered, "I consider that Army training has that effect"?—I consider just the opposite.

344. Your 12 years' experience in the police force is exactly contrary to that given by this gentleman?—I do not agree with his remarks at all.

Mr. Benson.

345. How long did you say that you were Chief Constable for Norfolk?—I was Deputy Chief Constable for Norfolk for 3½ years.

Colonel Murray.

346. Your experience is that cavalry men make the best police?—I think so.

347. Could you tell us what are the qualifications that make cavalry men better policemen?—As a rule, they are recruited from a better class of men than those who enlist in the infantry. In the cavalry not so many men are wanted, and they are picked.

348. Therefore, you think they are more suitable?—I think they are better educated and more intelligent, so far as my experience goes.

349. The infantry, I take it, would be disqualified by height from being policemen in your force, except in the brigade?—We find a great many infantry men who come up to the standard 5 ft. 9 in.

350. Do your men stay with you when they are appointed, or are they at all largely dismissed; I am asking you your experience as Chief Constable of Hull?—I found that I had to get rid of very few while I was there.

351. For any reason?—For any reason. I do not think I had to get rid of any of the Army Reserve men that I had to deal with there. They were all picked men as a rule, and there were no more men dismissed from them than out of the other class of men in the Service.

352. You took the men who had been in the Reserve, and those who had passed through the Reserve?—I had an age limit; I never took a man over 27 years of age. That is our rule, too, in the Metropolitan Police—the man's age, as a rule, is under 27.

353. Then those men must be still in the Reserve?—Of course, they must be. Some of them have bought themselves out. There are some men who come to us who have been in the Army, and buy themselves out.

Captain Bethell.

354. I noticed that in an answer to the Chairman when he was asking you about the character of these men, that you rather limited your reply, and said, "Personally speaking, I found them in Hull very satisfactory." Was that intended to limit your satisfaction in any way?—No, not at all.

355. I thought there might be some dissatisfaction expressed by the authorities?—No.

356. In Hull, did you have any seamen applying for posts in the Police. I mean bluejackets?—Occasionally some men applied who had been in the Navy.

357. Did you have any?—I think I had six; very few.

358. Were they satisfactory?—Very.

359. Do you happen to know whether they were 10 years' men, or something of that sort?—I think they were marines; I find them very good men. We had marines in the Norfolk Constabulary, as well as in the Hull Police.

360. Did you find these marines and sailors on the whole in your police force at Hull, where they had to do fire duties as well, more suitable?—They were the best men I had.

Mr. Benson.

361. Comparing your experience in Norfolk with Hull, I understand you to say that you found discharged soldiers just as capable of police work, under the conditions of country life, where they were isolated, as they were in towns?—Quite so.

Captain Grice-Hutchinson.

362. You spoke about picked men. How did you pick the men; what means did you take to pick them?—I mean the men whose characters were very good, and who came up to the standard physically.

363. How did you get their characters; of course, you saw their certificate?—Yes, I saw their certificate, and I wrote also to the commanding officer, and asked him privately as to their characters. If they did not bring a letter from the commanding officer, I used to write to him personally a confidential letter.

364. You have been talking about your experience of these Reservists as policemen; you have had experience both with rural police and with borough police?—Yes.

365. The experience of the chief constable who gave us evidence was purely connected with county work; do you think that in the borough an old soldier does better than in the country; is there more necessity for individuality and for general experience and independence in the country than there is in the borough?—I do not think so.

366. They are both equally good?—Yes.

Mr. Brookfield.

367. Have you read, or has your attention been called to, the evidence of the Chief Constable of Staffordshire?—No, I have not read it.

368. With reference to what you said about the men's character, you find it quite easy to obtain further particulars as to their characters besides the parchment certificates?—I had no difficulty in doing so.

369. You entirely disagree with Captain Anson's remark that one is not able to obtain a man's man's character?—I do not quite agree with that.

370. You disagree with his remark that the word "exemplary" was of no value; he states that a man who may be exemplary in a technical sense, and yet not in private life, is called a good character?—I do not know what he means by a reply of that sort.

371. You entirely disagree with him?—I do disagree with him there.

372. You disagree with him in stating that a soldier's training unfits him for the duties of a constable?—I disagree with him there; I say a good soldier would make a good policeman. If a man is a good soldier he will generally make a good policeman if he strives to adapt himself to the life.

373. What are your regulations about men being married when you engage them?—In London, as a rule, a man may be married, but he must not have more than two children at the time he enters the service. We do not profess, as a rule, to take men under 27 years of age.

374. A man may have two children when he joins you?—A man may join with a wife and two children.

375. He may have as many more as he likes afterwards?—Yes, 50 if he likes, but he is limited to two when he joins.

376. In your opinion, is a married man steadier than a single man, as a rule?—Yes.

377. Then you are rather in favour of a man being married?—Yes.

Colonel Lockwood.

378. With regard to the characters, have you any complaint to make as to the characters being given laxly. Do you think the particulars are gone into sufficiently honestly, or do you think the officer sits down and says: "This is a good fellow, and I will give him a good character?"—When I used to write for the characters the officers generally used to enter into particulars. I gave them a string of questions, and I used to wind up my letter with this remark: "Of course I shall be very much obliged if you will kindly tell me your honest opinion, whether you think this man is qualified for police work."

379. That would ensure your getting better men than if you simply went by the parchment certificates?—I would not go by the parchment certificates. I have found the parchment certificate altered sometimes. I would not take that for granted, as a man might be dismissed from one police force, and he would go into another, and show his parchment, but would not say that he had ever been a policeman before. He would make some excuse that he had been employed somewhere else. He might get you to write to somebody, and somebody might send you a fictitious reply.

Chairman.

380. Have you in your experience been sensible of any manifestation of a great desire on the part of any military authorities about the country to find employment for ex-soldiers?—No, I have never been asked by anybody to go out of my way to find employment for them.

Colonel Lockwood.

381. Do you think officers are sufficiently strict in giving characters?—I think sometimes they may say, as you have suggested: "Here is a good fellow, and I should like to help him if I can."

Captain Bethell.

382. When you were at Hull was the East Riding Association in existence for the employment of soldiers and sailors?—It was formed after I left. I have left for nearly nine years. I came here in August 1886.

Superintendent WILLIAM DAVIS, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

383. WILL you state what is your position in the Metropolitan Police?—I am the superintendent of the Executive Department.

384. What are your duties?—Generally the issue of all regulations and orders connected with the Metropolitan Police, the keeping of records of the strength of the Force, details of defaulters, and all other matters generally of an administrative character.

385. Have you anything to do with recruiting?—Yes, in a certain sense.

386. What is the procedure adopted with regard to recruits?—Usually applications are received from men who are desirous of joining the Metropolitan Police Force, and are submitted to the Commissioner, who deals with them in accordance with the regulations laid down for his guidance by the Secretary of State.

387. And when a man applies, he may possibly be an ex-soldier?—There are large numbers of ex-soldiers.

Chairman—continued.

388. Men still in the reserve?—Yes, plenty.

389. What is your limit of age for admission?—The limit of age for admission is 27, unless in exceptional circumstances.

390. That would admit Army reservists?—Yes.

391. Do the men themselves apply direct in case of Army Reserve men, or do you get applications made to you through any agencies or any Government establishment?—Applications have been made, I may say, through some agency, for the employment of Army Reserve men. I believe the place is in Buckingham-street, Adelphi.

392. Is there any rule in the Service which gives either an advantage or disadvantage to an ex-soldier, as regards his chance of employment?—I think it is exactly the same as that of any other man who applies, except that the numbers of men serving, who have served in, or who belong to, the Army Reserve, are limited.

393. What is your limitation?—The limit is that that there shall be not more than 550 Army Reserve men at any one time serving in the Metropolitan Police.

394. Out of a total strength of?—Some 15,000. The number formerly was 500, but it has been raised to 550 of recent years.

395. Does that include men still in the Reserve, or men who have passed through it?—Only men who are actually in the Reserve.

396. When a man has completed his reserve term, he is taken off that number?—Yes, he vanishes off that list, and makes way for another man.

397. Can you tell us whether that full number of 550 is worked up to?—I can tell you the exact number on the 31st December in a series of years who have formerly served in the Army; but, of course, on short notice, it is very difficult to say how many of these men are really Reserve men, because it may include a man like myself, who was in the Army 26 years ago, and who purchased his discharge. The numbers that are given also include the Militia. But the Militia forms a very small portion of the whole; as a rule, on the 31st of December in each of the last 20 years, there have been from 100 to 110 men who have served in the Militia, so that it is a very small number. Since 1875 up to 1894, on the 31st December of each of those years, the number has increased from about 900 to about 2,400, men who have served in the Army, that is, the percentages range from 9·49 of the total strength to 15·40.

398. That is, men who are Reserve men, or who have been?—Men who have actually served in the Army, irrespective of whether they have been in the Reserve or not, and these few, about 100 we may take it in round numbers, who have been in the Militia.

399. The conditions of employment are, of course, very stringent as regards height, and strength, and health, and so on?—Yes.

400. And also as regards character?—Yes, I may say they are very stringent.

401. What is your standard of height?—Five feet nine inches at present; it may be 5 feet 10 before long; that depends upon the number of candidates who present themselves.

402. I suppose you have more candidates than vacancies?—Oh, yes; far more, as a rule.

403. What is the modus operandi in inquiring into character in the case of a soldier; do you go upon his official character, or do you follow it up?—We follow it up. We inquire of his commanding officer. We find that absolutely necessary, because a short time ago there was a case in which a man was reported to be of good character, and on inquiring of his commanding officer, it was found he had been twice tried by court-martial for drunkenness.

404. What course do you pursue in the case of a man coming home from India, where his commanding officer is still in India, who is transferred to the Reserve directly on his arrival in this country?—We should write to his depôt.

405. Would you be satisfied with that?—Yes I think we should. Of course we should not attempt impossibilities, nor should we like to keep a man waiting perhaps three months while a letter was received.

Chairman—continued.

406. Is this limitation that you speak of under any specific rule?—You mean the limitation of the employment of Reserve men to a certain number.

407. Yes?—Well, the matter has carefully been thought out by the successive commissioners, and it has been decided that we could not spare any more than that number of men if they were called upon for service. Of course, if you were at once to ask for those men you would take away 550 men immediately from the strength. I presume the Army authorities might not take a man away if he only had two or three months to serve.

408. Do you think it has occurred to the authorities that in case of such an emergency as liability to invasion, necessitating the calling out of the Reserve, there would be a great state of excitement and alteration of our whole social condition; and that under those circumstances the difference in number of 400 or 500 policemen would not be a very important element in the case?—I should hardly like to answer that question offhand.

409. But still you have that feeling that they cannot afford to run the risk of having 500 men suddenly taken away?—I think not more than that. The present Commissioner has increased the number to 550, and I may say that he does not allow any man who wishes to join the Second-class Army Reserve to do so. You see he would keep another man out of a situation all that time, so the Commissioner now refuses to do that, and has done so for some time.

410. Therefore, practically, their liability with you lasts for about four years?—I can hardly say the period, but with those who join immediately on coming from the Army it would last about that time.

411. Do you know what branch of the Service your men come from?—Yes, I can say pretty well. On the 31st December last there were 308 men serving from the artillery, 625 from the cavalry, 1,288 from the infantry, and 108 from the militia, that is in round numbers of all ranks.

Colonel Lockwood.

412. Was your service in the Army a long one?—My service in the Army was four-and-a-half years.

413. Do you find, that as a rule, the reservists whom you employ have been unfitted for the duties of policemen by their service in the Army?—I should say not, myself. A man who has been a good man in the Army will make an excellent policeman. If he has been an indifferent man in the Army, of course, it naturally follows he is a very bad policeman.

414. And you are satisfied, as a rule, with the men that you get from the Army?—As far as I am able to judge. A certain number of the men who come from the Army are unsatisfactory.

415. Just as they are from other classes?—Probably a little in excess. There are a certain number of unsatisfactory men. I have looked through the records, and I find that a great many men who have been in the Army disappear in the first two years.

416. From drink as from the work being too hard?—From drink as a rule.

Chairman.

417. I gather that there is a difficulty in the case of an Army Reserve man, if you follow up his character, because you say if he comes from foreign service the only place you can apply to is the depôt, and that man may perhaps have been only a fortnight at the depôt, and all they know of him is that he has come home with a certificate; therefore he is under a disadvantage as regards your means of testing his character?—This is only an extreme test that we apply whenever it is practicable. I do not see that a man is under a disadvantage; probably he is under an advantage; he has the benefit of it. They have his record.

418. In the case of a civilian you would be able to follow up his character?—That is so.

419. Therefore you have better means of ascertaining a civilian's character than a soldier's?—In a sense, but if he has had less than five years' service we investigate his character before he joined the Army.

420. You do that?—Oh yes. We write to the local police and ask them what they know about him. He gives us his history and we follow it up.

421. Still, in saying soldiers sometimes turn out unsatisfactory in comparison with the civilians, there is this weak point in their case, that you have not the same means of testing the character of a man who has been on foreign service as you have that of a civilian?—We cannot follow it up so closely; we are obliged to take his character as the authorities choose to give it.

422. And the certificate he brings is more or less of a formal kind, is not it?—I do not think it is looked upon as of a formal kind, but it is and always has been the practice of police forces to authenticate everything as far as practicable by independent evidence. We send all certificates to the local police to be authenticated. We do not even take anybody's signature unless it is authenticated by the local police.

Mr. Brookfield.

423. The signature would be authenticated by the officer of the depôt?—Yes. I take it his discharge would be satisfactory or he would not have been appointed to the Army Reserve.

Captain Bethell.

424. I should like to ask you whether you have any sailors?—Yes, we have a good few sailors in the Thames Police.

425. Is the Thames Police under the Commissioner?—Yes, it is under the Commissioner of Police.

426. Do those sailors give satisfaction?—I believe they do.

428. Can you tell me whether these men have served their first term of 10 years in the Navy; they would not be pensioners, I suppose?—The age limit has been reduced of late years, and that has cut some of them out.

429. It used to be 35 and now it is only 27, and that would cut many of the older men out?—Yes.

430. The age limit of the Thames Police, you mean?—Yes, I am speaking of the age limit in the Thames Police; our age limit for admitting a man.

431. But the age limit of seamen is 28?—I could not answer that question. I thought you were speaking with reference to our age limit.

432. I quite see that, but my point is rather this; our men leave the service at the age of 28, and they have, according to your evidence, behaved very satisfactorily in the Thames Police; would not it be possible to leave some of those appointments open to them?—I could hardly say whether it would be practicable.

433. Is it a matter which you would feel yourself at liberty to bring before the Commissioner?—It is not, sir. These rules are fixed after a great deal of consideration, and can only be altered by the Secretary of State.

434. Then you are not able to tell me whether the bluejackets who are in the Thames Police have served their first period of service?—I am not.

435. They may have bought their discharge?—I know we have a good few bluejackets and many from the merchant service also. I may say they have to join the land police first, and occasionally have to wait a long time before they are taken into the Thames Police, owing to the absence of vacancies.

436. I apprehend the Admiralty do not trouble themselves about it?—I do not think I have ever seen any names sent in from them.

437. I gather these would be purely independent applications of the men?—Yes, we should hardly accept one that was not purely independent; if a man came and asked how he was to join the police, we should tell him what to do, to make his application in his own handwriting.

438. What I meant was, would not you accept a list of names from associations especially desirous of assisting Army or Navy men?—I am not sure whether that would be done. Each individual must make his own application in his own hand.

Colonel Murray.

439. I think you said there were 550 Reserve men allowed in the service at one time?—Five hundred and fifty men actually attached to the Reserve at one time. Of course, out of those 550 there are men whose time expires every few days; there are always some dropping out.

440. Could you say what is the average number of vacancies that that gives to the Army in your force?—During the last six years 14 per cent. of men who have been taken are Army Reserve men. That by no means represents the number who applied, because probably from 50 to 60 per cent. of the applicants do not pass the doctor.

441. Fourteen per cent. of the 15,000 men are Army Reserve men?—Yes, actually accepted.

Mr. Brookfield.

442. Did you say that 50 per cent. fail to pass the doctor?—More than 50 per cent. of the applicants fail to pass the doctor.

443. For what would an Army man be likely to be rejected by the doctor, for his chest?—I should say, inferior physique.

Mr. Brookfield—continued

444. General physique?—Inferior general physique. A very large percentage of the failures are on account of inferior physique generally. Of course, a considerable number of men come up who have no chance whatever of passing, they may suffer from bad flat foot and bad feet and legs. Infantry men are often bad on their legs.

Captain Stopford, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

445. Will you please tell us your position in the Prisons Department?—I am a Commissioner of Prisons, and Director of Convict Prisons.

446. The Committee desire to have your evidence as to the extent to which retired soldiers and sailors have been and are employed in the Prisons Department. I should mention that by retired soldiers we do not mean necessarily pensioners, but soldiers who, having under the short-service system fulfilled their term with the colours, have passed into the Reserve. Can you give us some figures and facts as to the state of things?—According to a late return, taken on the 31st October 1894, for 12 months, there were 1,088 persons who filled up forms of application for appointments.

447. Perhaps we had better go back a little further. What is the total staff under the Prisons Department?—In the local prisons the total staff is 1,269.

448. What do you mean by local prisons?—What used to be county prisons.

449. In Great Britain, or in England only?—In England and Wales.

450. What proportion of vacancies do you have in that establishment in the course of the year?—About 87.

451. Seven per cent.?—Yes.

452. Can you say what proportion of that 87 would be filled up by Army and Navy men?—About 49 Army and Navy men, and 38 civilians.

453. So that more than half are filled up by soldiers and sailors?—Yes.

454. What determines that proportion?—We get more applications from the Army and Navy than we do from civilians.

455. In what form do the applications reach you?—The man either writes or applies personally at the Home Office; he is then sent to the governor of the prison nearest to the place where he lives; the governor gives him a form to fill up, and writes his report as to his eligibility.

456. When there are two or more applicants for a vacancy, who determines the selection?—It is determined at the head office, the commissioner's office.

457. Not by the county authorities?—No. It is entirely in our hands.

458. And you have to proceed by these written characters?—Yes.

Chairman—continued.

459. You do not see the men?—No, the governor of the prison sees the men; if it is necessary, we can see them.

460. Would he give a recommendation as to two or three applicants?—He generally writes on the application whether he considers them eligible or not; if they are not eligible he states the reason.

461. As regards a vacancy, you may have different recommendations from different governors who have not seen the same men?—Yes.

462. It rests with your department to determine who are nominated?—Yes; the other is only a preliminary arrangement.

463. How are the characters of soldiers investigated? Take, for instance, the case of a soldier returned from foreign service and applying for a post under your department; how do you pursue the inquiry into his character?—We get the parchment certificate to begin with, and recommendations from his commanding officer. We have access to the defaulter books, and we prefer taking a man with a clean sheet if possible.

464. How do you go to work in the case of a man who has just returned from foreign service when there is no particular record kept of him here?—We must go entirely by his testimonials.

465. That would be his certificate?—Yes.

466. He may have no private testimonials?—Very likely not. We should not hesitate to take a man with "Very good" on his parchment or "Exemplary"; we should hesitate about taking a man with simply "Good."

467. Do you find there is any agency existing for bringing the cases of soldiers before you?—No.

468. The application comes from the man himself?—Yes, generally.

469. Just as if he was any other member of the community?—Yes, quite so.

470. In your opinion, would there be any objection to increasing the proportion of ex-soldiers and sailors?—Yes, I think so. There is rather a growing feeling that the military element should not predominate too much in the prisons.

471. You say the military element, but you are aware that after a man has served four years in the Reserve he becomes a civilian? In fact, he

he is a civilian while he is in the Reserve, but he ceases to have any connection whatever with the Army at the end of that time?—Yes, that is quite true.

472. Then would that objection hold, or do you mean to say that the fact of a man having been in the Army is an objection?—I do not myself think there is any objection, but there is a feeling outside that there should be a certain proportion of civilians in the prison service.

473. But still this man is a civilian after he has completed his term of service?—Yes.

474. He is an ex-soldier, but he is no longer a soldier; would you not call him a civilian?—We should classify him as a soldier. I have been 32 years in the prison service, and I was 13 years in the Army, and I am called a soldier still.

475. That is the way you deal with these men; you still consider them soldiers?—Yes.

476. Then the mere fact of a man being in the Army would, to a certain extent, be a disqualification?—No; I cannot say that, the simple fact of a man being in the Army is not a disqualification. We should take him, and if he were a non-commissioned officer, we probably should take him before anyone else, but we should not refuse a civilian if he were the better man of the two.

477. You have no hard-and-fast rule, but the result has been?—That the soldiers get the preference because there are more applicants.

478. You were speaking, so far, of what we call local prisons?—Yes.

479. Can you give us figures as regards central prisons, convict prisons?—In the convict prisons on the 28th of June, according to a late Return, we had 690 subordinate officers. Out of those 421 were soldiers, sailors, or marines, and 259 civilians.

480. So, there again, the ex-military element has the predominance?—Yes.

481. What has been your experience as regards the relative merits of the two classes?—My experience of them is this, that a non-commissioned officer makes the best warder. To begin with, he falls more readily into the rules of the prison system. In the long run the civilian makes an equally good prison officer, but he does not fall into the prison ways so readily as the non-commissioned officer does at first.

482. What do you mean by prison officers?—Subordinate officers; we call all officers, from the chief warder downwards.

Mr. Pickersgill.

483. I did not quite catch your answer with regard to falling into the prison ways?—The non-commissioned officer falls more readily and quickly into the duties of the prison, but in the long run the civilian makes as good an officer.

Chairman.

484. Have the local authorities any patronage in the question of appointments?—No, none at all.

485. Still, it is not an open competition; you go by testimonial?—We go by testimonial.

Colonel Murray.

486. Have you any standard of height and size?—Five feet six is our height.

487. Could you say which branch of the Army predominates?—We have no means of saying.

488. You do not keep any record of that?—No, we have no record; they are all classed together, naval and military.

489. You have no details as to whether they are infantry or cavalry?—No.

490. Would a man have a better chance of employment if he were able to bring any further details as to character with him?—Yes, certainly. The question of character does not rest alone with us. After a candidate is nominated he goes before the Civil Service Commissioners; they look into his character before he is certificated.

491. You say the non-commissioned officer makes the best warder; do you find that other ex-soldiers who have not been non-commissioned officers make satisfactory prison officers?—I do not think they do altogether. I do not think an old private makes a good warder.

492. But the soldiers who leave the Army now are not old?—No; our age is from 24 to 42; I think 24 too low; a better age would be 30.

493. Or anything under that, such as 26?—Yes.

494. In fact, when a man leaves the colours and goes to the Reserve?—Yes.

495. And you find that class of soldier satisfactory?—Yes, I think he is satisfactory, certainly. I do not know that I have noticed him particularly, but I think he would be.

496. Equally so with civilians?—Yes.

Captain Bethell.

497. Are you able to distinguish between soldiers and sailors?—No, I have not any means of doing so.

Captain Grice-Hutchinson.

498. Are these the men who have completed their 21 years with the colours, or a large proportion of them, or reservists?—I cannot tell you the difference between the classes, but we do not hesitate to take a Reserve man if he presents himself.

Chairman.

499. The question has been raised whether the police might not be placed in difficulties by the Reserve men being called out. You have not suggested it?—No, we have had no difficulty at all.

Mr. Pickersgill.

500. You commenced giving us some information, but you did not follow it up. I think you said that during the 12 months ending 31st October 1894, 1,088 persons filled up applications for appointments?—Yes.

501. Can you tell us how many of those respectively were civilians and how many military men?—716 were naval and 372 were civilians.

502. Then with regard to the appointments?—There were 87 appointments, of which 38 were civilians and 49 naval and military.

503. Then you told us that the staff in local prisons was 1,269. Can you tell us how many of those were warders?—No.

504. I suppose really the bulk are warders?—They are all warders, but they are different grades, principal warder, warder, and assistant warder, warder, and then in the convict service there is what they call the civil guard.

Mr. Pickersgill—continued.

505. Does the 1,269 include the clerical service?—No.

506. They are all in the nature ot warders?—Yes, they are all warders.

507. Has the proportion of military and naval persons employed greatly increased since the local prisons were taken over by the Central Department from the justices?—Yes, I think so.

508. Very greatly?—I think so. We have no means of ascertaining what the numbers were when they were under the magistrates, but I think there were fewer soldiers taken on then than there are now.

509. Comparing the present time with the earliest years of the central control, has it increased since then, since it has been under your jurisdiction?—We have had more applications.

510. Yes, but have you made more appointments of military men?—Yes, I think so.

511. From what class do the civilian applicants come?—We prefer taking them from the artizan class, men who have a knowledge of a trade and likely to be useful, such as shoemakers, tailors, or carpenters.

512. And at what age do warders enter?—They enter at 24.

Mr. Pickersgill—continued.

513. That of course applies, I presume, to military and naval men?—Yes, just the same.

Colonel Murray.

514. You have mentioned the clerical service of your Department; are ex-soldiers available for that?—No, they are not.

515. For any particular reason?—No.

516. The men are not quite qualified?—Not always.

517. If a man came to you with qualifications, what then?—It might be done.

518. What would be the qualifications?—He should certainly be a good writer and understand figures, and he ought to be generally intelligent.

519. He should understand bookkeeping?—Yes.

520. Most soldiers who leave the ranks can write well?—Yes. An orderly room clerk, for instance, would make a very good clerk in the Prison Department.

521. Could you give us the numbers that are employed?—No, I cannot. There are not many. We have a few employed as schoolmasters, schoolmaster warders, and they get about 12*l.* a year more, and are available for clerks.

522. And a fully-educated soldier would be competent?—Yes, quite competent.

Tuesday, 9th April 1895.

MEMBERS PRESENT:

Mr. Benson.
Captain Bethell.
Captain Fenwick.
Captain Grice-Hutchinson.
Colonel Lockwood.
Colonel Murray.
Lord Edmund Talbot.
Viscount Wolmer.
Mr. Woodall.

VISCOUNT WOLMER IN THE CHAIR.

Chairman.] Mr. Woodall suggests that it would be an appropriate thing that we should pass a Resolution of sincere regret as to the loss the country and the House have sustained in the sudden death of our Chairman, Sir George Chesney, and to say how much we have appreciated his labours on this Committee, and his invariable courtesy.

Sir CHARLES WILSON, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

523. HAVE you prepared any notes on which you would like to be questioned?—No; I did not know what information the Committee wished me to give.

524. You are Director General of Military Education, are you not?—Yes.

525. Before coming to the general subject of this inquiry, there is a special point upon which the Committee wish for your evidence, and that is, how far there is now entering the ranks of the Army a class of recruit who from education and previous training may be considered likely, after leaving the Army, to be eligible for minor clerical appointments in the Civil Service?—I think the class of recruit entering the Army is not very different from what it was a few years ago; it depends to a great extent on the general education of the country. But more work is done in the Army schools now than used to be done. Perhaps I might explain that better by giving the number of men who have gone up for first-class certificates of education. In the year 1892, 1,005 men in the Army went up for first-class certificates, and 423 obtained those certificates. In 1893, 2,225 men went up for first-class certificates, and 619 obtained their full certificates; 993 obtained a pass in three subjects. I may perhaps explain that in 1893, for the first time, a man was allowed to take up only three subjects and to go up afterwards for the other two subjects. In 1894, 3,007 men went up for first-class certificates, 809 obtained them, and 1,246 passed in three subjects.

Colonel Lockwood.

526. The first year it was different, was it not?—The first year they were not allowed to take up only three subjects. In March 1895, 2,255 men went up for their first-class certificates. That is for the half-year only, so that the half-year of 1895 shows a greater number than the whole year in 1893. This shows satisfactory progress in education, and in the number of men who go up for first-class certificates. I think a very much larger number of men would go up if our first-class certificate were accepted for certain appointments.

527. But there are a great many appointments, are there not, where it is necessary to have a first-class certificate?—In the Army, but I meant outside the Army. For instance, the Post Office might accept our first-class certificate.

Chairman.

528. The late General Feilding gave evidence as Inspector General of Recruiting, and he mentioned the fact that there was an increasing number of men joining the Army whose trades or professions were those of clerks?—That I have no personal knowledge of.

529. It has been suggested that in the minor clerical branches of the Civil Service which are open to public competition a certain proportion of posts might be reserved for competition, but between ex-soldiers only; that is the class of men of whom you have been speaking. Do you consider that a feasible suggestion, and that they are a class of men fitted for such posts?—I think that would be a very good system if it could be introduced. I had better state exactly what the character of the first-class certificate is. Our examination for a first-class certificate corresponds very nearly to the boy-clerk examination of the Civil Service Commissioners. I have here, if any Members of the Committee would like to see them, the examination papers for the last examination; they will perhaps explain the character of the examination.

Captain Bethell.

530. What classes of subjects, roughly, does the first-class certificate embrace?—Arithmetic, writing writing from dictation, writing a full copy from a précis or a letter from a draft, English history, and geography. There is also a voluntary examination in European or Oriental languages, and in certain military subjects.

Chairman.

531. Do I understand that the examination for the first-class certificate is very similar to the examination for the admittance of boy clerks to the Civil Service?—We consider it higher than Standard 7 of the Education Code, and it may be taken to be equivalent to the examination of boy clerks as conducted by the Civil Service Commissioners.

532. Besides men who are sufficiently well educated to obtain a first-class certificate, are not there a considerable number of men in the service who are practically used as clerks, either in the orderly room or at various head-quarters of districts; would that training be of any assistance towards such Civil Service appointments as I have mentioned?—An orderly-room clerk's training would only be a training as a copying clerk, or not much more.

533. But surely some of these Civil Service clerkships are very little else, are they?—I think that some of them are very little more than copyists.

534. You have given considerable attention to the subject of employment of discharged and reserve soldiers, have you not?—Not lately. I did when I was Director General of the Ordnance Survey at Southampton. A great many cases used to come before me there.

535. When did you vacate that appointment?—In March last year.

536. Will you briefly tell the Committee the impressions you gained from that experience?—The men I had chiefly to deal with were engineers, who had received a rather higher education than men of the Line. At Southampton there are four companies of Engineers engaged on the survey, and every soldier who conducts himself well and has shown ability for survey work, is employed as a civilian after his term of service has expired. In addition to these men who are employed on skilled survey duties, there are a certain number of labourers; for those posts there are a large number of applicants; and I generally used to give the preference to pensioners and reserve soldiers. It was not often possible to employ pensioners as labourers on the field work; they were generally either too old or not active enough, and we preferred younger men; but for printers' labourers, messengers, and posts of that kind, I generally preferred having pensioners or reserve men. But what struck me most at Southampton was the number of reserve men who were constantly passing through the town seeking employment. I could not give employment to all of them, and they had to pass on to the next town.

537. Had you any means of judging of the character of those men?—They showed me their discharge papers, and, as a rule, their discharges gave good characters. It was simply a case of not being able to obtain employment.

538. Were they men who had recently obtained their discharges?—Some of them were, and others had been discharged for some time longer. In some cases the men had been wandering about from town to town trying to get employment, and had not been able to get it.

539. Have you no particular view as to the possibility of assisting these men, which you wish to put before the Committee?—I think that some of the smaller appointments in the Government service might be reserved for them, and that our first-class certificate might be accepted in some of the cases in which an examination is required by the Civil Service Commissioners.

540. Did the men you employed, presumably selected with care, prove satisfactory?—Yes. I think the percentage of failures was smaller than in the case of men drawn from civil life, as all the pensioners and reserve men employed had the sense of order and discipline.

541. Let me ask you a question I put to General Feilding. I asked him, "Has your attention been drawn to the statement that was made during the discussion on the Army Estimates; the Director of Education stated that hardly one man in nine or ten could read or write properly, and that a contractor who in 1890 asked for labourers for the Ship Canal mentioned that only five out of 20 could read and write; in some cases the proportion was only one in 20, and that in another case a score of men were wanted for a railway goods department in London, and the conditions were that they must write and add up a few figures, but that 20 men could not be found, although they were quite capable of doing the work required?" Then General Feilding asked, "What year was that in?—(A.) This was said on the 6th July last year." Then General Feilding said, "All I can say is that on the 1st January 1892 there were 371 per thousand men who were recorded as having superior education." That was rather a strong statement for a Blue Book, but I presume it is correct?—I have the report of my predecessor here in which that passage occurs.

542. Can you throw any light on the matter?—I think that the recruits, or the greater proportion of them, are young men who have left the board schools at the age of about 14, and have had no further education before entering the Army. During the period from 14 to 18 many of them forget a great deal that they learnt in the board schools, so that the education of the great mass of the men is not better than it is in civil life.

543. But this refers simply to reading and writing, which are things which could hardly be forgotten, could they?—The reading and writing of many of the men is very bad when they join the Army; it improves greatly after they have been in the Army schools.

Mr. Woodall.

544. Are you prepared with any statistics of education education generally with regard to the Army at the present time, as compared with, say, 10 years ago?—Not as regards 10 years ago.

545. Or with any past date; you have said that the general educational proficiency of soldiers bears very much the natural relationship to the civil population?—Yes.

546. And inasmuch as we experience steady improvement from all the statistical returns in the general culture of the ordinary population, do you find pretty much the same, no more and no less, amongst soldiers?—Certainly, the soldier is very much the same as the civilian of the same class.

547. Can you give us the figures such as you have included in your report showing comparatively what is the relative degree of culture between the two?—In the Appendix to the Report on Army Schools for 1893 a comparison is given between 1888 and 1892, and in the Army Return for last year is given the state of education up to the end of 1893. I can make a comparison between 1888 and 1893 and send it to the Committee, if they wish, and there may be returns for a longer period.

548. Will you prepare a general statement covering all the grounds on which we have any statistics bearing on the subject, and put it in, showing the general improved tendency of popular education as bearing upon the common soldier?—Yes.

549. And, if you can, will you give us any further evidence with regard to the effect upon the personal character, and especially upon the industrial habits of the soldier, so far as it can be held to have run pari passu with the statistics of instruction; do you think you would be able to supply information of that kind?—With regard to the industrial education?

550. So far as any figures would indicate it, could you show whether the better education which the soldier has enjoyed has made him more regular in his habits and conduct, and whether it has given him any better inclination towards industrial life?—I am afraid I have no definite information upon that point.

551. But you would probably be able to give us your own personal opinion?—I think the improvement in the soldier during the last 15 or 20 years has been enormous in every way, but there are great difficulties connected with the question of technical schools which has been raised.

552. How far have you given your own personal and official attention to the inculcation of industrial habits, and some kind of training in industrial matters, with regard to soldiers?—The question, in its general bearing, has not been fully considered yet; the difficulty has been with regard to time and to instructors. The Army schoolmasters are now very fully employed, their time is more occupied, I believe, than that of schoolmasters in civil life, and the only time at which instruction could well be given would be in the evening.

553. That is to say, that the literary curriculum occupies all the time which is available in the daily process, does it?—The Army schoolmasters have to give instruction to the children as well as to the adults, and practically they have to teach about seven and a quarter or seven and a half hours every day; that is quite as much as a man can do profitably.

554. Then what are the opportunities enjoyed by a soldier of acquiring anything like a technical training or manual instruction?—The only opportunities are in the tailors' shops, the farriers' classes of two months at Aldershot, and the regimental workshops.

555. Would you say that a soldier who had enjoyed the advantages of that particular kind of training, went into civil life with a greater certainty of obtaining employment than one who had not?—I think a soldier who had been through those classes would have a greater chance of obtaining employment in civil life.

556. Then do you favour an extension of that kind of instruction?—Certainly; I think every facility should be given for that class of instruction.

557. Have you had any opportunity of ascertaining or observing whether that kind of training given, under the circumstances you have described, to the soldier, would be regarded with anything like jealousy by the civil workman with whom he would come into competition?—Only on the Ordnance Survey. There is a certain amount of jealousy between the civilians and the pensioners who are employed after discharge. Generally a man who has risen to the rank of sergeant or sergeant-major on the Ordnance Survey is a man of superior capacity and intelligence, and, usually, having been in a place of authority and command for a large portion of his 21 years' service, he is given a place of importance when he leaves the service. This has given rise to a certain amount of jealousy between the civilians and the pensioners who are employed.

558. Referring again to the industrial exercises which one sees in barracks, for example, you know that there has been a disposition to employ soldiers in work of that kind, do you not?—Yes.

559. Such handy work as they could be put to for extra payment. Are you not aware that protests are made, from time to time, by the trade unions against their being so employed?—Not to my personal knowledge.

Captain Grice Hutchinson.

560. You have spoken of technical education, and you have said you thought it would be a very good thing with regard to the soldier obtaining civil employment, if some system of training him for a trade could be carried out besides what you have mentioned?—Yes.

561. Have you any idea as to how it could be carried out. Do you think, for instance, an establishment such as that at Aldershot would be taken up and welcomed by the soldier?—I think the soldiers would attend in winter, not in summer.

562. Voluntarily?—We know from our returns that the attendance at the schools is very much larger in the winter. The men come into the schools in the winter, but in the summer, summer, particularly after field-days and after much drill, they are not so disposed to work. I believe if a school of that kind were started at a large camp like Aldershot or the Curragh, it would be largely attended during the winter evenings.

563. You have never gone much into the question, I suppose, but what sort of technical education do you think would be most desirable; carpentering and shoemaking?—Carpentering, shoemaking, and smith's work.

Colonel Lockwood.

564. Would you suggest shorthand and typewriting also as well as a handicraft?—We encourage a knowledge of shorthand writing now. An order will be out next month, awarding prizes to soldiers who obtain certain certificates in shorthand.

Captain Grice Hutchinson.

565. One bar that has been mentioned to a soldier getting employment; in the Civil Service is the limit of age; he is too old. Do you not think an exception could be made with regard to the reserve man, so as to give him more latitude as regards age for the Civil Service?—I certainly think there ought to be a special exception for soldiers.

566. What is the limit of age for the Civil Service appointments, do you know?—I believe it varies in the different Departments.

567. But still, as a rule, the reserve soldier is too old, is he not, when he leaves the colours, for any such examination?—Yes, he is too old for many appointments.

Colonel Murray.

568. I understand you to say the Military Education Department consider the first-class certificate gained by the soldier to be equal to something rather higher than the seventh standard of the National Education Department?—Yes.

569. Is that recognised by the Civil Service Commissioners, that you are aware of?—No.

570. Is any military certificate recognised by them as giving any advantage in their examinations?—Not in the regular Civil Service examination, but there are certain appointments, those of warders in the military prisons, for instance, to which men are appointed without an examination by the Civil Service Commissioners.

571. Without examination from the fact of their having the higher class of military certificates?—Yes; they are specially recommended by the Secretary of State for War.

572. One question with respect to technical education. The men you employ chiefly in the Survey are engineers, are they not, who have better education than linesmen?—They are all engineers.

573. Had you any of the reserve men of the Infantry in your employment?—As labourers, not as survey men.

574. Then you have no opportunity, have you, of seeing if those men had any knowledge of any industrial work?—In some cases we had, such as those of men employed as skilled printers' labourers, and appointments of that kind; sometimes we got men who in early life had been printers or lithographers.

575. They have not had the opportunity of learning anything of that kind in the service, have they?—Not in the service. I may, perhaps, mention that some very good men first joined the Survey as labourers in the North and West of Ireland. After serving for about two years as labourers they enlisted in the corps, went through the schools at Chatham, and then came back to the Survey as trained sappers. Those men who when they were labourers had a poor education sometimes turned out very well.

576. It has been stated in evidence, by a manager of one of the great railways, that if soldiers were to apply to them for employment, with some knowledge of book-keeping, that they would have an advantage, and would possibly be employed more frequently than without such knowledge. Would it be possible, under the present system of education in the Army, that some men should have the opportunity of learning book-keeping to fit them for a clerk's position?—I think it would be rather difficult to fit book-keeping into the present course.

577. As you have said, the schoolmasters would not have sufficient time under the present system?—The schoolmasters would not have sufficient time under the present system to teach a separate subject.

578. They would have to give up some of the other education in order to do it, would they?—Yes. The education of the adults is principally with a view to their obtaining the second-class certificate of education.

579. Would it be possible that soldiers should attend the national schools of education?—I do not think a soldier could well attend the national schools. A man in uniform attending one of the national schools would be a prominent person, and I do not think it would be satisfactory.

Mr. Benson.

580. I did not quite follow the figures you gave as to the men who have entered for the first-class certificate during the last few years. I gather that now the examination may be taken in two subjects at a time?—Yes.

581. And that is a change which has been only lately made?—Yes; in 1893.

582. That would, of itself, bring about a considerable increase in the numbers entering each year, would it not?—Yes.

583. That is to say, a number of men would go up two years running?—Yes.

584. And that would increase, would it not, the total entries each year for first-class Army certificates?—Yes; I have given the number of men who went up each year.

585. Are they new entries each year?—Not all; of the 3,007 men who went up in 1894, 2,502 were new entries. Information respecting the men who went up in March last is not yet available, but it is known that the number of men going up for their first-class certificate has largely increased.

586. With regard to the engineers employed under the Survey Department, a good many of them left you, I suppose, without your being able to find permanent positions for them on the Survey?—Very few of the good men. Some left

587. Do you happen to know anything about what became of the other men?—In some cases.

588. Were they men of unsatisfactory character, generally?—No; some of them were good men; some of them are surveyors in the Straits Settlements and Ceylon, and other places. Many of the men who leave the Survey go abroad.

589. Have you any knowledge of their finding a difficulty in obtaining employment afterwards?—A good man who leaves the Survey never has any difficulty in finding employment.

590. You said just now that you thought the Civil Service Commissioners might accept your first-class certificate as equivalent to passing some examinations which they held. Had you any particular examinations in mind when you said that?—I was thinking of the Post Office.

591. To the examination that postmen go through?—Yes.

592. A first-class certificate examination is far superior to the examination postmen are put through, is it not?—I have no knowledge of the examination postmen have to go through. I was thinking, however, of letter carriers, letter sorters, and positions of that kind.

593. As a matter of fact, your paper is very much stiffer than postmen, or that class of men, are put through. Had you not thought of any other Civil Service examination which it might be taken as equivalent to?—I think in the Customs Department soldiers and sailors might be employed more than they are.

Colonel Lockwood.

594. As clerks, do you mean?—As clerks and extra men.

595. With your examination, do you mean?—With our examination.

Mr. Benson.

596. Do you happen to have talked over this question with the Civil Service Commissioners, or do you know much about the character of the various examinations that they hold?—No, I have not spoken to them myself, but the question was discussed some years ago with the Civil Service Commissioners.

597. Will you tell the Committee with what results, if any?—I think the result was that they were bound by the Order in Council of the 4th of June 1870.

598. At any rate, it did not result in any offer from them to take your certificate as equivalent to their examination, did it?—No.

599. Have you any information showing the advantage to a man after he has left the Army of having obtained a first-class certificate; could you, for instance, say whether a man, with the amount of education implied by a first-class certificate, would find any difficulty in getting any suitable employment afterwards?—No, I have no information upon that point.

600. You said it would be possible to institute technical schools for the Army in places where there were a large number of soldiers like Aldershot?—Yes.

601. In the ordinary garrison towns there are very often technical schools for the civil population; would it not be possible for them to be made use of for the training of the men of the garrison in those towns?—I do not think it would be popular amongst the soldiers.

602. Do you know if there would be any difficulty in the way of a soldier who wished to attend such schools in attending?—I do not think so, but I have had no communication with commanding officers on the subject.

603. If there were a number of men who wanted to attend, I suppose it would be possible for the military authorities to make special arrangements with the managers of such schools, would it not?—I think that could be done by the payment of certain fees.

Mr. Woodall.

604. Following up what Mr. Benson has asked, in garrison towns and other places where there are soldiers' homes, which we know do so much good, is it a common circumstance that they have classes in connection with those homes of an educational character?—I have no personal knowledge as to that.

605. A soldier has abundant leisure and opportunity, has he not, for spending his time profitably in such homes and institutions as exist in different garrison towns?—Yes, in the evenings.

606. And there would be nothing to prevent his joining with comrades in pursuing any studies for which facilities would be afforded, would there?—No, there is nothing that I see to prevent that.

Chairman.

607. Will you be able to furnish the Committee with the form of the second-class certificate, and give us the figures of those passing?—Yes.

608. Will you put in a copy of this Return, and give us a short memorandum of the state of education in the Army, comparing the years 1894 and 1874?—I will give as good a comparison as I can.

Mr. Woodall.

609. If I might suggest, you will have gathered what are the general purposes of the Committee, and you might put in a memorandum expressing your own general view of the effect and tendency of the changes in form of instruction under which soldiers have benefited of late, fitting them for civil employment?—Just so.

Captain Fenwick.

610. You are aware, are you not, that in the year 1891 there were positions in regiments or battalions which, by an alteration of the regulation in that year, had to be filled by men holding first-class certificates?—Yes.

611. Do you not think that that has contributed a good deal towards the large increase in the number of men going up for first-class certificates?—Certainly; it has had a very considerable effect.

612. Might I ask you also whether the present standard for first-class certificates has been raised during the last few years at all; are the papers more difficult, is it more difficult to obtain a first-class certificate now than it was, say, five years ago?—I do not think there is very much difference. The change was made in 1888.

Chairman.

613. Supposing that the Civil Service Commissioners gave the special age allowance to Reserve soldiers to enable them to compete for posts for which they are at present ineligible owing to excess of age, would it be possible for you to arrange for prospective candidates for those posts to have classes preparing them for examinations?—That depends a great deal on what the examinations would be. I do not think we could introduce many additional subjects into the course of study, as it has been framed to enable men to get, in the first place, second-class certificates, and, in the next, first-class certificates.

Mr. C. S. Loch, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

614. Are you Secretary of the Charity Organisation Society?—I am.

615. Are you aware of the subject of the inquiry of this Committee?—I am.

616. In your opinion, is the difficulty in finding employment for reserve and discharged soldiers practically confined to those who have served in the Infantry?—So far as I can ascertain, it is so. I may say I have been connected with the association for dealing with them, and I understand that is the feeling prevailing there.

617. Are you aware that last year over 10,000 infantry soldiers were passed to the Reserve?—Yes.

618. What would most of these men have been before they enlisted, so far as you have been able to ascertain?—So far as I know, they would be men who would be unskilled, or, at any rate, those men who belonged to a skilled trade would probably care less for their craft than other men who would desire to stick to it.

Captain Bethell.

619. Are you including pensioners?—I was speaking solely at the moment of the Army Reserve men.

Chairman.

620. The question then, in your opinion, is, is it, how to find employment for unskilled labourers?—Yes, or people who have forgotten their skill.

621. Do you believe in any method for fitting these men for work of the type of labour performed by an artisan?—I confess to have hoped that that was possible. I am speaking of what one hoped some years ago, but I understand that one can hardly expect that now; that is to say, that the craft would rather be lost in the course of a military training than kept up, or indeed completed.

622. And you, of course, as a civilian, have no knowledge as to whether it would be possible to keep up that craft training?—I cannot speak upon that point.

623. Have you been able to form any opinion as to what proportion of these men are unable to find work?—I cannot give you that information in anything like statistical form; I think it is impossible.

624. Do you believe that any considerable portion of them become vagrants?—I have constantly heard that amongst the vagrants there are many men who are discharged soldiers, and from other statements that they are Reserve men. I could perhaps put that before the Committee clearly in connection with the Special Committee of our Society, which reported in June 1891, on the Homeless Poor of London. It was one of the questions that came before them. At that time we asked persons connected with the administration of the casual wards and the refuges in London to give evidence, and Mr. Elkerton, who was at that time master of St. George's, Hanover Square, Workhouse, told us that there were a great many discharged soldiers. He said, "I should think that of the men under 40, fully half had been in the Army. I fear I cannot go into the question of their having good discharges, they say they cannot get employment." Mr. Stewart, at that time superintendent of the St. Pancras Casual Ward, said, "We have a good number of soldiers. If I take 20 men, I should expect to find two soldiers among them; Reserve men." Mr. Duppas, superintendent of the St. Giles Casual Ward, said, "We get a great many who have been soldiers, and a great many of them belong to the Army Reserve. There are a great many Army Reserve men in casual wards." Then Sergeant-Major Shaw, at that time superintendent of the Newport Market Refuge, which is a refuge to which the better class would resort, was asked, "By this Report for 1889, I see that of those admitted the very large number of 250 consisted of discharged soldiers, 57 painters, and 85 labourers of all kinds; they make up the bulk. That would be the very class of persons who would probably be out of work?—(A.) Quite so, sir. (Q.) It seems to me a very large number?—(A.) In the year 1890, 211 old soldiers passed through. As a rule, they are Army Reserve men. (Q.) With regard to these labourers and painters, would they be physically fit for work?—(A.) Yes, we would not take them otherwise. (Q.) And the 210 old soldiers; would they be fine strong men?—(A.) Yes, able-bodied, as a rule." He was asked why these men leave the Army, and he said, "I find it is to get the deferred pay. After 12 years' service they have about 40*l.* to take. While that lasts they do not trouble about seeking for employment. (Q.) It seems a very sad state of things, because it is not only in your refuge, but in others?—(A.) No doubt. (Q.) Do you think think that if there was a depôt formed in London, by the Goverment we will say, for those old soldiers to go to, say on probation for six months, and then if they were found suitable, allowed to enter the Army again, do you think anything of that sort would do?—(A.) I do not think it would work, for the men would not go. After a man has taken his discharge he cannot go back until he repays his deferred pay. (Q.) You think this a bad system?—(A.) Yes. (Q.) Do you find that as a rule these discharged soldiers are ready to work?—(A.) Yes, as a rule. (Q.) Do you get them employment?—(A.) No, we keep them and make them look for it." They keep them seven days. Then he was asked to compare 1890 and 1891, and he said, "I think the number of reserve men is about the same." He could not account for so unusual a number. Then he says, "the majority we get are all able to work as labourers." We do not find they get work as readily as others, principally I should think because they are unused to work; the Army discipline has really done them harm as regards resource. Then taking another shelter which is in Stepney and with regard to which a friend of mine was very much interested, his statement was, "I should think that more than half of these soldiers (he was under the impression there a good many) had good discharges." Turning to other casual wards in the city they had not many soldiers; in Whitechapel they had not a large number. I should be inclined to draw the conclusion that these men gravitate to certain West-end shelters and certain particular refuges, and that, I think, one could not therefore judge from their number in certain places that they would be equally distributed over the whole area of the casual wards. We also asked an inspector of police of the A division who was kindly permitted to give evidence, whether "the respectable working man in your opinion is entirely absent from those sleeping out at night"? His answer was, "I never came across him; I come across a good many old soldiers. They resort to the lodging-houses chiefly till their money is expended; then they seek casual wards and refuges." We also had a casual himself under cross-examination who bore the name of Thomas Jones. He gave us this information, "There are a great deal, a great many more now under the six years service. In some wards I have been in, out of ten admissions there have been as many as six discharged soldiers. The majority would not be men of good character. A soldier with a good character now-a-days, on leaving the force has a chance to get a good billet. Some of them have as much as 18*l.* on leaving, and they have only to keep themselves for a week or so before they get situations." Then he says, "It is chiefly through their own fault that they come to the casual ward." That is a sort of combination of evidence which must be taken rather as general evidence, but still as the evidence of men who have daily to deal with the more or less homeless class.

625. On that evidence, and your own very wide experience of London poor, are you of opinion that most of these ex-soldiers who are out of employment are reserve men, or men who have left the Army for other causes?—It is very difficult to give a precise answer to that. My impression is that the last Witness I quoted was fairly right, namely, whatever they may be, they are not a very desirable class. The Committee that went into this evidence came to this conclusion. The Committee was composed of Members of our own society and of persons representing the refuges, and the Poor Law in London generally. They say, "One class whose presence amongst the homeless is much to be deplored, is that of the old soldiers and Army reserve men under the short-service system, estimates as to their number varying very greatly, but probably they constitute not less than one-fourth or one-fifth of the whole class of destitute, homeless people." Personally, I am inclined to think that is a high estimate.

626. Is this in London?—No, it says here the whole class, but I think you may say it is London, because the Report had to do with London.

627. Did they take evidence about anything else except London?—No. "In the battle of life the soldier is a feeble combatant. He is a 'man who has been trained up to lean so much on authority and discipline that when turned adrift on the world he is at a loss how to shift for himself.'" That is quoted from the Annual Report of a House of Shelter for 1890. "The system of 'deferred pay' seems to intensify the evil. After 12 years service the soldier on his discharge receives a sum amounting in some cases to nearly 40*l.* This, too often, seems to him an inexhaustible fund, and he is content to live in idleness until it is consumed. In the meantime he often becomes demoralised, and acquires a distaste for work. Many of the old soldiers out of employment are, no doubt, persons of bad character, and in some cases they may in adopting a homeless career, be merely reverting to their proclivities prior to enlistment, but it is worthy to note that, out of 77 homeless soldiers who applied to the St. James' Charity Organisation Committee in 1889, no less than 36 had 'very good' discharges—a remarkable fact, even when allowance is made for the leniency with which such discharges are usually given. In striking contrast with the number of soldiers in the absence of naval seamen from the homeless ranks. For instance, at the St. James' Charity Organisation Committee, which has dealt during the last five years with over 1,200 homeless persons, 'a homeless able-bodied seamen from the Navy' appears to be unknown." That practically is their summary of their evidence, and it must be remembered that the people on whose behalf that was written were all in different parts of London dealing, more or less, with this class of case, so that a good deal of general knowledge is also summed up in it.

628. What is the date of the Report?—The date of the Report is June 1891.

Chairman.

629. Is it your opinion that these men contain a mixture of all characters, and that they are not mainly bad characters?—Yes. I think that the last evidence I quoted would to my mind be pretty absolute, partly because I know that in those cases the references have as far as possible been verified. In the general statements one receives there is not that verification, as a rule.

630. The men who had simply reverted to a loafing life or whose conduct was bad, I am afraid we must leave out of our calculations, but as to those who left the Army with good characters, and are physically sound, have you any advice as to the best way of helping them to obtain work?—I have never thought that the provision of work through Government Offices and so on would really meet the difficulty, and it seems to me a pity that men of this class should converge to London. Therefore there seems to me to be two conditions which, if possible, should be considered. First of all, it is very desirable that local opportunity for work should be given to the unskilled labourer; and next, I cannot help thinking that the more the system of unskilled labour becomes permanent, as it has been made lately in the docks, and as it is made now, I think, in connection with the South London Gas Works and so on, the more will it be possible for those authorities who, after all, want a clean, well-bred, serviceable labourer to take on definitely so many people a year. I should have liked to have suggested a more complete system, but I confess, after trying to think what would be possible, it seems to me we cannot do more than make as far as we can permanent arrangements with the very large employers of unskilled labour to draft definitely a certain percentage of the Reserve men into their ranks. I am afraid there is nothing more to be said than that.

Mr. Woodall.

631. In expressing that opinion, are you aware of what the railway companies have done?—Yes, I am quite. I was only thinking possibly it might be pushed further in connection with other branches of unskilled labour, for which I should imagine the soldier, with whom we are concerned, would be more fitted, such as docks, gas works, and so on.

632. Have you any knowledge as to what would be the feeling of the responsible organisers of those different bodies of labourers with regard to the intrusion of the ex-soldier?—Do you refer to the employers or the employed?

634. Of course that better organisation is under trades union rules, but do you think that those who are the executive officers of the trades unions would place any difficulty in the way of the acceptance of the ex-soldier as a competitor with an ordinary civil labourer?—I do not know what the trades unions would say to it, but in the matter of unskilled labour the trades union has really comparatively little power to what it has in connection with skilled labour. On the other hand, giving my personal opinion on the matter solely, I cannot help thinking that the trades union would do a better service if it promoted permanent labour, rather than if it was only a union for the purpose of merely raising wages. I think that the docks companies themselves were very inclined to take this line irrespective of the great strike, and I cannot myself see how, considering the conditions of the labour market and the comparative ease with which unskilled labour comes to the front, it is possible by the trades union system to organise unskilled labour.

635. But you would attach, would you not, a great deal of importance to the advantages of permanent employment, and are not you aware that the trades unions protest that they do not attach any importance to the permanence of employment?—I am.

636. And that they attach more relative importance to the rate of wages, even though the term of service may be concluded by an hour's notice?—I am aware of that, and it seems to me that until that view of the question is, perhaps, somewhat modified, it is not possible to deal with these men as one would wish to do in the interest of the unskilled labourer. I think the view I am urging is the best.

637. Do you regard that policy on the part of the executives of the trades unions, and particularly of the labour organisations, as unfortunate?—Yes, in its most absolute form.

Mr. Benson.

638. When you referred just now to the better organisation of labour, did you mean the better arrangements on the part of employers?—Yes; I meant the word "organisation" in its general sense, and not in any particular sense. It seems to me the trades unions were trying to get a higher wage, but not a more permanent employment. I thought their interest in this matter was coincident with the interest of the employer, and that a permanent employment in unskilled labour was really the thing to work for in the future.

Captain Bethell.

639. Your recommendation, then, with regard to these Reserve soldiers, I understand, is that something should be done with the large private employers of casual labour, and that some steps should be taken to persuade them to give employment?—Yes.

640. Do you know what has been done by the railway companies?—Yes.

641. Do you know that it does not appear to have been entirely satisfactory?—I can understand that. We can hardly expect it yet, and I think, on the whole, the class of labour I have been referring to would be more suitable for the particular men we are concerned with.

642. But, on the other hand, the evidence we have had from all the witnesses who have given evidence about the railways is that they all agreed that the soldiers are not satisfactory men where hard work is concerned, and the recommendation which you make would appear to be that they should undertake this hard work for which they do not seem to be extremely well fitted?—I think that is an important point. If

these men are not up to the hard work of unskilled labour, of course it is a very grave criticism on the position altogether. One would naturally imagine that a percentage of the men in the Army would be comparatively weedy fellows, who would not be able to do this work, and for that percentage I do not see what is to be done. Although they have been in the Army they are practically unfitted for outside work of any sort, unless they are clever in some other way. Therefore, with regard to them, I do not know what we can do. The country has so far made a provision that if they are destitute they can get relief, but I should imagine the bulk of the men ought to be in a position, when they leave the Army, to do hard work. It is a most serious thing, drawing the men into the Army as we do, that we cannot put them back with strong muscle, at any rate, into the labour market, because it is on that they must depend.

643. I quite agree it is very unfortunate, but the evidence is all one way. Have you any knowledge of your own which would to any extent be in opposition to the evidence we have had from the railway authorities upon this question of hard work?—No, I have no such evidence. In what sense do you mean?

644. Whether these reserve men are able to undertake the hard work which is required of an ordinary labourer doing hard work. Have you any such evidence?—No; all I can say is, in a talk with the secretary of the association, he did refer to a good many of these men as unable or unwilling to do this work.

645. Unable or unwilling?—It is difficult to say which it is, but it is often a blend of both.

Captain Bethell.

646. The fact of the matter is that one blends into the other, I suppose?—Yes.

647. Have you any evidence about men who have served 10 years in the Navy other than that they do not come into these casual houses and workhouses; anything as to their powers of labour or their adaptability for labour?—Speaking as a society, we have employed some of those men, and we always find them very satisfactory; they seem to be very ready, full of resource, and make very good officers.

648. You have been connected with the society a good many years, have you not?—Yes.

649. Have you ever heard anybody suggest that in that particular there is a deterioration in the capacity of sailors for adapting themselves to civil life in late years?—I have never heard that.

Chairman.

650. Do you include marines in the sailors?—Yes.

651. Have you no theory why a sailor turns out so much more adaptable?—No; I am afraid I cannot give you any theory as to that.

Mr. Benson.

652. In your experience, I understand you have come across a remarkable number of men in the reserve who have no special skill or educational qualifications, who are without work, but you have not, so far as I understand, come across anything to show that men possessed of any special skill or capabilities have any difficulty in getting work?—No, I do not think so; I think they do get work.

653. You have not come across any such, have you?—No, I have not.

654. You said you thought it unlikely that a man who before going into the Army had been a skilled workman of any kind, would be able to recover his skill on return to civil life. The Committee have had some remarkable evidence from Dr. Anderson, the head of the Ordnance Factories, to the effect that men who had been mechanics before entering the Army, very readily recovered their skill?—I think that would be true if the men are employed upon similar work in the Army. I was referring to the linesmen only, who are rather of a different type.

655. He was not referring to that kind of men. He was not referring, for instance, to the engineers, but he referred only to infantry men. Supposing that to be true, are there any arrangements, or rules of trades unions, which would put any obstacle in the way of a man getting back into his skilled trade after he leaves the Army?—No, I do not think so. Being interested in this question I looked up the rules of one or two societies, taking for granted for the moment the hypothesis that a man would leave the Army as a fairly-skilled artizan. Taking the Amalgamated Society of House Decorators or Painters as one, I find the entrance fee for full members is 5*s.*, and trade members 2*s.* 6*d.*; painters of from 20 to 45 years of age, who have worked at the trade for five years and receiving the current wages of their town, are eligible for full membership. Painters of from 20 to 50 years may join as trade members. Then the Amalgamated Society of Boot and Shoemakers, London, the entrance fee is as follows: shopmates who have not worked in a society town pay 1*s.*; if they have worked there more than six months they pay 2*s.* Then come the rules as to apprentices. Then, any number of journeymen in the trade and other societies may be admitted on payment of an entrance fee of 6*d.* a member.

656. But are there not in many of these unions rules requiring a man to have served an apprenticeship for a certain length of time?—In the engineers, which is perhaps a trade applicable to this matter, they have a graduated entrance fee. A candidate for journeyman must have served a five years' apprenticeship or have worked five years, or in the case of some branches of the trade seven years, and be in receipt of the usual rate of wages. That apprenticeship would have been served in a case of this kind before the man went into the Army, if at all.

657. But that is rather peculiar to the engineers, is it?—I took those out as fairly good samples, and I noticed that one. I have another sample here. In the case of brass founders, the London Society, the entrance fee for 25 to 35 years of age is 5*s.* They do not appear to require require an apprenticeship, but candidates must be competent smelters, firemen, or trimmers.

Captain Fenwick.

658. From your experience, can you say whether you think there is very much prejudice now against employing reservists?—I should say not.

660. You think, generally speaking, among private employers of labour there is no prejudice against reservists, do you?—Perhaps I have not knowledge enough to make an absolute statement, but that is my impression. I may say sometimes if we want extra men, I like to get these men of the non-commissioned officer type who have been broken in.

661. You employ a great number of officers, I suppose?—We employ officers in London, but not a very great number. We have one attached to each committee, but a good many of the men we employ are men who have been soldiers.

Captain Bethell.

662. The evidence we have had from various special employers of labour is that they are unable to give the discharged soldiers a very clean sheet with respect to drinking. Have you any evidence to give the Committee on that point?—The only suggestion I can make is this: The fact that a good many are in the vagrant ranks would be, generally speaking, an argument to support the evidence which has been given. I cannot go into the matter in detail. If the Committee desired, I could give an analysis of a large number of cases which would tell their own tale, but nothing further.

Colonel Murray.

663. Some comparisons were made between the sailor and soldier reservists, and you said you noticed that sailors were very satisfactory. Can you tell whether those sailors you noticed were put to the hard unskilled work?—No, I am not speaking of that at all; I am speaking on the general question entirely.

664. Can you form any idea of the different class of training itself, which makes them so handy over the Reserve soldier?—I am afraid my reply would be a little theoretical, but my impression is that the mere muscular training of a sailor is of immense importance in this matter.

665. Has he any technical knowledge over the soldier which fits him for employment over the soldier?—I could not say, but I think in some ways possibly he is superior to the ordinary man in the line.

666. From the facts that have come under your notice, can you say whether the reserve soldier is well educated, and as well educated as an ordinary civilian at his time of life?—I always make them show me their parchments and certificates, but I do not think they write so well, or a great many of them, I think, do not. Most of them I see have the second-class certificate. I do not think it is their forte; some of them write very nicely.

667. Do you think the education they have received in the Army is of any advantage to them in after life?—I think the judgment I read from the paragraph in this report is fair about that, and it is a question as to whether they have such resources when they leave as a man of that age, without having gone through the Army, would have.

Chairman.

668. The number of men in London who have served in the Army at one time or other must be very large, must it not?—Yes, I should think so.

669. And those men who are at work, I suppose, would only form a very small proportion of the number?—That is certain, I think. You see, it is a matter of disposing of 10,000 in the year.

Mr. Woodall.

670. It is a larger number than that, is it not?—I was only speaking of the infantry. That, of course, is all over England and Wales, all over the kingdom, in fact; and I do not think it is an appalling number relatively to population, by any means.

671. Was any evidence brought before your committee to give any idea whether these men were Londoners before leaving, or who, after discharge, were countrymen converging to London?—If you want that information I can give it you. I can find out where the men came from in a good many instances, but I could not give it offhand. I should have to take it from the papers of a series of men whom we have dealt with as homeless. If you desire it, I could furnish you with it.

672. Will you furnish the Committee with that information?—Yes.

Tuesday, 30th April 1895.

MEMBERS PRESENT:

Mr. Benson.
Captain Bethell.
Mr. Brookfield.
Captain Fenwick.
Colonel Murray.
Lord Edmund Talbot.
Viscount Wolmer.
Mr. Woodall.

VISCOUNT WOLMER IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. ARTHUR HARRIS, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

673. ARE you general secretary of the Labour Protection League?—Yes.

674. And are you affiliated to the Trades Union Congress?—Yes.

Mr. Woodall.

675. Will you explain to the Committee as to what area the Labour Protection League with which you are connected deals?—The area with which we deal is from London Bridge down to Woolwich Arsenal.

676. You include, do you not, the class of labourers who are employed in the Woolwich Arsenal and in the Ordnance Stores?—Yes, in the Ordnance Stores, and also the Ordnance Factories.

677. And men who are employed in the dockyards?—We had, until quite recently, several branches affiliated to our organisation at Portsmouth, and also one at Chatham, but being such a long distance away they have severed themselves from us, and now stand on their own bottoms.

678. Is Deptford in your district?—Yes, Deptford Victualling Yard is in our district, and the majority of labourers there are in our organisation.

679. May we take it that your association is not by any means limited to men in Government employ?—Quite so.

680. Can you give the Committee any idea of the proportion of members of your league who are in Government employ, and those who are not?—Between 1,200 and 1,400, I should say, are in different Government employs in our organisation.

681. Out of a total of what?—It is rather a funny thing to define labourers in Woolwich Arsenal, but out of a total of 3,000, 1,200 are in Government employ in some shape or other.

682. You are aware, are you not, of the general purposes of the inquiry which has been delegated to this Committee?—Yes.

683. How far has the subject come under your notice?—I have been in the Government service 12 years, both in the naval establishments at Chatham Dockyard and also in Woolwich Arsenal, and the matter has come under my notice ever since I was first employed. I was first employed as a youth, and I wish to speak now about promotion.

Mr. Woodall—continued.

684. Are you aware that under the short-service system which is now in operation young men are taken from the ordinary field of labour, and that they spend their seven or eight years with the colours as soldiers?—Yes.

685. And during that time the ordinary labour market is relieved from the competition which, presumably, they would create by their presence. At the expiration of that time it is thought that they come with very strong claims upon their countrymen for special consideration in regard to employment for which they may be suited. Do you recognise in your official capacity, and in your organisation, the claim which they have thus presumably established?—No, we do not recognise that. But, speaking as an official of an organisation where Government employees are, if they are physically fit to perform any job they are employed upon, we have no grievance against them doing it, if you do not, as a Government, take into consideration their pensions, and so reduce their wages, which affects materially the wages of the civilians who are employed; that is the point.

686. That is a point I will deal with further on. It is maintained, in consequence of the service which they have rendered to the country during the time they have been with the colours, that they are entitled to special preference in seeking employment afterwards. Are you prepared to admit that they are entitled (all other things being equal) to a preference on account of their coming as old soldiers?—No.

687. Do you think it would be unfair to those who have been engaged during all their preceding years in civilian labour of different kinds if they were exposed to what you would call an undue competition by those who came as old soldiers?—Quite so.

688. Can you give the Committee any reason for that objection?—Yes. First of all, are you confining your questions to the short-service system?

689. I am confining my question now entirely to reservists who have completed seven or eight years with the colours?—I should say that they engage in a contract to serve under the colours; they

they are not forced into the business; then why should they be given a preference in the labour market? It is of their own free will that they engage in the service; therefore, why should they be given preference any more than a man who has given his labour for the industrial benefit of the country?

690. Then you do not admit that they have conferred any obligation on their fellow countrymen by enabling them to carry on their ordinary industrial work in security and peace?—I do not.

691. Do you think that the fact of their drawing reserve pay should be held at all to prejudice them in the competition with men who have not even that small amount of regular income?—That is a question that I should answer in this way: if you take the reserve pay as a retainer for their services, and do not use it to come into competition to pull wages down, I should have no objection to it at all.

692. I think we must take it for granted that a soldier who has earned his reserve pay for services already accomplished ought not to run the risk of having that taken into consideration in fixing his rate of wages in future?—I am pleased to hear you say so, but you know it is an acknowledged fact that it is taken into consideration. I say that railway companies in this country and other large industrial affairs take into consideration the wages of the reservist, and they reduce their wages in the same ratio.

693. Are you able to give the Committee any information bearing upon that point; for example, let me take the line with which you are most familiar; do you happen to know whether the South Eastern Railway Company, in employing goods porters, make any difference in the rate of wages which they offer to the ordinary civilian and the ex-soldier?—Where they draw their goods porters from is the agricultural districts, where the wages are an inducement for them to join the service of the railway companies. Among goods porters you very rarely find men who have been engaged in, we will say, dock work, or as bricklayers' labourers, or anything of that kind; you generally find them young lads from the agricultural districts, and also reservists. You would not find men applying for 15*s.* and 16*s.* a week who had been getting 6½*d.* and 7*d.* an hour; it only affects reservists and the agriculturalists.

694. Then do you draw a distinction between the dock labourer and the agricultural labourer?—Yes, there is a difference.

695. Do they command a different scale of remuneration?—The ordinary dock labourer commands 6*d.* an hour, and the ordinary agricultural labourer about 2¾*d.*

696. I am speaking of them when they come to seek employment, for example, in the goods yards of a railway company like the South Eastern. They would not receive the same scale of remuneration as the dockers, would they?—The dockers would not apply.

697. Where an ex-soldier applies for employment under a railway company, as a matter of fact, I have no doubt you are aware that the associated railway companies have undertaken, having felt it their duty and consistent with national policy, to offer employment to a certain number of ex-soldiers year by year?—To keep wages down; they use the reservist pay to keep their wages down.

698. In what way does it have the effect of keeping down the average wage?—A man with 3*s.* 6*d.* a week is probably prepared to accept a lower wage than a man who has not got it. He can then subsist on 17*s.*, making up 1*l.* 0*s.* 6*d.* a week, whereas the ordinary civilian if he took such a post would only have the 17*s.*

699. Let me call your attention to the evidence given before this Committee by Sir Henry Oakley, who, I daresay you know, is not merely the manager of the Great Northern Railway Company, but who in many important matters represents the associated railway companies generally. He says, that supposing a rustic taken from the plough, the agricultural labourer to whom you have referred, and a discharged soldier entering the railway service, they do so at exactly the same rates of pay. If they are employed in London, they begin at 17*s.* or 18*s.* a week for the first year, rising to 19*s.* for the second year, and 20*s.* for the third year. Then, after that it goes by promotion. A single man, he says, may go up to 30*s.* a week, or if a man gets to be a foreman porter he gets from 20*s.* to 27*s.*; and there are chances of promotion for steady and reliable men. In addition they get clothing, and perhaps some other advantages?—Quite so.

700. Are the Committee to understand that you accept the general statement that agricultural labourers, or the labourers that are employed by railway companies, whose time has been spent entirely in civil occupations, are treated exactly the same as a soldier?—I have never known any difference. It has never been before my notice that there is any difference; but, as I have said before, an ordinary town labourer would not seek such employment.

701. Do you think the ordinary town labourer, a man, for instance, who is a member of your association, regards himself as belonging to a grade higher than the agricultural labourer, and, generally speaking, higher than the old soldier?—You said "higher grade;" it is more a question of wages. A labourer engaged in the building trade in London earns 6½*d.* an hour, and, probably, in the summer-time he might be working 60 hours a week; such a man could not accept 17*s.* a week. I do not think there is any feeling of class between the agricultural labourer and the town labourer.

702. But I take it from you that in the general competition of railway employment the class of labourers you represent, who claim the higher rate of wages, decline to seek employment; because they prefer such employment as that in the docks and the Arsenal to such employment as they can get in the railway goods yards?—It is a question of wages. I should say they would.

703. The Committee would like you to give them any evidence, or any justification for your contention that the competition of the soldier, with the small amount he draws as a reservist, has had the effect anywhere, within your own knowledge, of keeping down the market value of civilian civilian labour?—I can give you that. At Stone's, the contractor at Deptford, the average workman employed is an old retired soldier with a pension ranging from 1*s.* to 1*s.* 4*d.* a day, according to the regiment he has served in, and that fact is made use of by them in this way: that they give them only 16*s.* a week, which those men take. Now, if you were to take those men and employ them in the Surrey Commercial Docks, they would be physically unfit for the business.

704. Have you not made rather an important statement?—I am only speaking now of old retired soldiers, who have been to India and suffered ague and those kinds of things.

705. You have come now to a very important distinction between the old soldier who has earned his pension, and who must therefore be at least 21 years in the Army, and the very much younger man who enlists, say at 19, and comes back into civil life at 26?—There is a distinction, of course.

706. I am indebted to you for helping the Committee in that respect, because I should like to ask you whether, in the responsible position you occupy, you do not recognise the principle that a man should be paid rather what he is worth than according to a fixed and uniform scale which you would apply to all men?—I must confine my answer to your question to where there is a medical examination as to the physical fitness of a man for a particular business. In Woolwich Arsenal you spend a tremendous amount of money in respect of examinations of all men employed, whether they are retired pensioners or men of short service, and a man has to be fit to enter the service. He is put under the same examination as I was when I entered Woolwich Arsenal, and I say, as far as he is physically fit, he ought to earn the same pay as I do; but with respect to Stone's, at Deptford, where there is no medical examination, these old men are taken on (and some of the old chaps there are as able to do a good day's work as young men); they use the pensions of the men to keep the wages low. I make a distinction between where there is a medical examination and where there is not.

707. Let me dismiss the question of Government employ. We want to ascertain what are the general conditions under which labour is employed in different private undertakings. You cited the case of one where old soldiers are employed, and paid at a rate much lower than you think they ought to be with regard to the standard rate of wages for labourers?—I can mention another, Tuff's, the contractors for the Government cartage.

708. You will perhaps remember a case where it was brought under the notice of the War Office that a carman contractor at Woolwich was paying the men he employed to go about with the horses and carts at a lower rate of wages than the current rate because they had pensions?—Quite so.

709. Do you remember what the rate of wages they were paid was?—12*s.* and 14*s.* a week up to 16*s.* for 75 and 80 hours' work.

710. What would be the rate which you would regard as the current rate for competent men?—24*s.* and 25*s.* a week.

711. Do you remember what the statement made by the carman contractor in vindication of the low rate of wages was?—No.

712. Perhaps you will accept it from me that he stated these men were not required to do any hard work; that they were required merely to lead about the horses; that they received quite as much money as they were worth, and if deprived of that employment it would be very difficult for them to get other employment; and perhaps you are aware that the decision of the War Office Department was, after a Resolution passed by the House, that in the next contract the contractor was required to pay current rates. I want you to tell us what became of these old men?—They got the money; they did not discharge any at all.

713. Is that within your own knowledge?—Yes, it is within my own knowledge.

714. Then you are not prepared to admit that for the soldier who has worn himself out in the service there should be some provision made by which he should be allowed to accept any lower rate of wages, are you?—No, I cannot accept any lower rate of wages. If he is physically fit to do the work he ought to be permitted to do it.

715. I must ask you to go back to the assumption that he is not physically fit to do the hard work?—The young man who knocks at the door is physically fit. He knocks at the door, so does the old man, but the old man is prepared to accept, because of his pension, a wage of 15*s.* a week; the young man cannot accept it, and you send the old man to an early grave by making him accept it. It is nonsense about an old man not being able to do the work, because I have seen them doing labourers' work. It was said that they were only asked to lead horses about, but they were asked to empty guns, and all that kind of thing.

716. But do you not admit that there is a class of men who have to work as labourers who are not physically fit to do the full day's work of a competent man?—Quite so.

717. Supposing that man to be an old soldier, do you not admit that some employment should be found for him for which he would be paid the sum he was found to be worth?—Taking the County Council as an example, there are plenty of jobs, such as attending to closets and different little light jobs, where if you had an able young man he would not do the work better than anyone else. He has only that certain duty to do, and the old man could do it as well as a young man of 25. An old man could be put on that kind of job, and in the more laborious work you could employ the young man.

718. Do you think that a man comparatively exhausted should be paid for the work he is capable of doing at the same rate as the younger man?—He should be paid a living rate of wages, that is my idea, so that he may live decently.

719. And you will not admit that the pensioner who is in receipt of an amount which brings up his smaller earnings to the living wage should be enabled to live upon that?—No.

720. Although you admit that it helps to make what you call a living wage?—Quite so, but it is an agency in keeping me, as a civilian, from earning a living wage.

721. Then may the Committee take it that you think, on a complete survey of the whole situation, there is no ground for giving preference to men who have served either for a long term, which entitles them to a pension, or for the shorter term, which entitles them to reserve pay?—No, not at all.

722. I understand you also have a feeling that undue preference is given to men who have been non-commissioned officers?—That is so.

723. What kind of employment have you in your mind which they are supposed to have a preferential claim in respect of?—I have had a tremendous lot of experience in this class of matters, and I am going to cite civil firms and Government establishments as well. During the opening of the stone yards at Bermondsey, the St. Olave's guardians' extra relieving officers who were appointed were appointed from police inspectors who had retired with 38*s.* a week pension. The labour masters in the yard were nearly all retired sergeant majors. Of course it was the fault of the local authorities for appointing them, but these men probably had pensions of more than what the men in the stone yards earned. Now there are plenty of good, honest, intelligent men who could carry out discipline in those yards who were working on the stones. What was there against those men being appointed to those positions? In Woolwich Arsenal I remember a case with regard to a warrant officer of the Royal Regiment of Artillery who used to be an instructor of gunnery, and used to take parties round the buildings, instructing young cadets or sergeants. He gets near his pension time. There is a certain store where a young lad had been for years, and had only gained the rate of 23*s.* per week for being there. There was no complaint about his duty. The instant this man was discharged with his pension, I do not know the amount, but it is a good pension of about 30*s.* a week, he was put into the store over this boy, pitchforked in by some private influence, and a special rate of wages made for him of 28*s.* Now, why was he any more qualified for that position than that boy, who had fulfilled it for three or four years previously?

Mr. Benson.

724. By a special rate of wages you mean a higher rate, do you not?—Yes, a special rate made for him. The departmental rate was 23*s.*, but this was a special rate. I say that is unfair to the civilian who had been there and did the same service, without any complaint, as he was engaged to do.

725. Was it a new appointment?—It was a new appointment made for him.

726. Did he take the place of the man?—No, the man was retained in the store, and he was put over him.

Chairman.

727. Did not you lay down the doctrine just now, with which I humbly agree, that in fixing a man's rate of wages the pension that he has earned ought not to be taken into consideration?—Quite so.

728. Then why in this case should it be taken into consideration?—Because I say, why not promote the man who had served in the store? This was the question of a man who had never been employed in the Ordnance Factories.

729. Would not the answer of the official responsible for the appointment be that it was a post that, in his judgment, had developed, and required as superintendent a man of great experience in managing men, and whom he could thoroughly trust in the store?—Why would not another man who had managed in a dock manage men as well? He could manage men, and not only that, he would have a good knowledge of labour, while the other man has never had anything to do with it in his life.

730. Do I understand you to lay down this rule, then, that those who have the appointment of such a superintendent of stores or work in the labour yard should be prohibited from appointing anyone who has a sufficient pension to live upon?—That is so, or at any rate men who have nothing of all should be given the preference.

Captain Bethell.

731. Other things being equal; talents being equal and knowledge being equal?—Yes; that a man who has a pension to live upon should not be brought into competition; the man who has nothing to live upon should have the first offer.

Chairman.

732. At what point do you put a living pension?—We are trying to get 24*s.* a week in the Ordnance Factory; 30*s.* a week a man could exist on.

733. Would you lay down this rule: that no man having 24*s.* a week pension ought to be appointed to any post so long as there is any person not receiving a pension who is qualified for the post?—That is my view.

734. Who is to decide whether there is another person equally competent for the post?—I should say the public body that appoints them, when we can get them democratic enough.

735. Did not the public body who appointed these men to the stone yards presumably come to the conclusion that they were the best men for the post they could find?—I suppose they did in their judgment, but it was under a protest from the labour members on that board.

736. That was merely a matter of opinion, was it not?—Quite so.

737. May we at any rate take this: that if there is a man with a pension competent for a post, and there is not an equally competent man without a pension, you have no objection to the pensioner receiving it?—Oh, no, but I have never found it yet.

738. And that the amount of his pension ought not to be taken into consideration in fixing the scale of his remuneration?—Quite so.

Mr. Woodall.

739. Whether he be a labourer or a warrant officer?—Quite so.

740. I should

Chairman.

740. I should like to ask a question about those reservists who you said kept down the market rate of wages; you evidenced the railway companies?—Yes.

741. You admitted that all the employées of the railway companies in the goods yards, whether they had been in the Army or not, received the same rate of wages?—I think so; I think there is a minimum; I do not know if there is any promotion at all.

742. But that the rate of wages would rise if it were not for the reserve men?—Yes, and the agricultural labourer; I must put him in.

743. We are not talking about the agricultural labourer now; you said it was the fact that these men received reserve pay that kept the market rate of wages down?—Yes.

744. Is it your opinion that if there were no men in existence with reserve pay, the market rate of wages would go up?—Yes, I think it would.

745. And do you deliberately say that the agricultural communities would not keep the rate of wages that they receive now if it were not for the reservists?—I do not think the agricultural districts could supply the railway companies.

746. Are you aware that the proportion of reservists to men drawn from agricultural communities in the employment of railway companies is infinitesimal?—Yes.

747. Sir Henry Oakley said in his evidence that in May 1890 they had 301 reservists in the employment of the Great Northern Railway Company; what proportion would that bear to the whole of the men employed by the Great Northern Railway Company as porters?—A very small one.

748. Then do you mean to assert that the fact that 301 men were to be found there would govern the rate of wages received by thousands of others who are not reservists?—You are only quoting one railway, of course. Have you any evidence from the South Eastern, because there are a tremendous lot of reservists on that side of London. The Great Northern is a line going to the north, and the great number of reservists are paid off in London and get employment there as a rule. I am not prepared to take that evidence as ruling every railway; it is only one railway.

749. Are you prepared to say that the rate of wages of the porters of the railway companies in this kingdom is in fact controlled by the existence amongst those porters of a small proportion of reservists?—I confine my remarks to two classes, that is the agricultural class and the reservists. I say that a lot of it is due to the reservists' pay being taken into consideration by the railway companies to keep wages down.

750. That is your opinion, is it?—Yes, it is my opinion.

751. You laid down the general rule that you personally and your organisation do not admit that old soldiers, whether reservists or pensioners, should have any preference in seeking civil employment. Do you admit the necessity of an Army and Navy?—I suppose we must have them under the present system.

752. Do you admit that it is in the last resort one of the natural functions of every able-bodied man to defend his country and the interests of his country?—The defenders of the country are the people who produce the wealth of the country in my opinion; that is a matter of opinion.

753. I mean to defend the country and the wealth which the labour has produced; do you admit that it is a part of the duty of every civilian in the last resort; that it is one of the duties which comes upon us all?—It is a question to me what we have to defend. I do not know that it is a duty to defend the present system which we are suffering under.

754. I did not say anything about system; I said the country, that is the actual territory and the goods produced by the labour and the food that comes to the people to eat; is it the natural duty of you and I as able-bodied men to protect it?—Yes, we shall always protect it.

755. Are you aware that in France and Germany, and in fact every continental country, that duty is actually performed by every able-bodied man?—Yes, I know that.

756. But in this country the duty which you admit is in the last resort incumbent upon all of us is taken voluntarily upon the shoulders of a small proportion of our fellow-countrymen, is it not?—I think I should prefer the other thing; let everybody do a bit.

757. If we did not find men who were willing to do this voluntarily, it would come to our all having to do it, would it not?—Quite so.

758. You admit that, do you?—Yes, probably it would.

759. Is it your opinion that some form of conscription would be a preferable system?—It would make everybody trained in arms; that is all the benefit it would have.

760. But would you and your friends like to have to go into unhealthy climates; to India, Burmah or Nicaragua, or the West Coast of Africa?—Yes, I should very much like to go there myself; I have never had the opportunity of going. It would be very preferable to take some of my poor chaps out of Bermondsey and put them into Malta; it would do them good, I assure you.

761. My question is, you admit it has to be compulsory or voluntary?—Yes, under the present system.

762. And you admit, I suppose, that a great mass of our fellow-countrymen would not join you in desiring it to be made compulsory?—I do not know that; I have never asked anyone else's opinion. It is a question of going into the Army. People say, "I will go into the Army"; they take the responsibility of it, and I do not see why we should make special provisions for men who voluntarily enter the Army.

763. My question is, do you not think that men who relieve you from doing involuntarily this work deserve at your hands some assistance when they who have done your work come home and find themselves handicapped by this: that whereas you have spent your earlier years in perfecting yourself for civil employment, they come back without any aptitude for civil employment and possibly with constitutions somewhat injured by climate?—Are you speaking of men who have served 21 years?

764. Yes, or seven years?—If a man has served his country in the capacity of a soldier he ought to have a pension to enable him to live

if he has served 21 years. If he is a colonel or a general he has enough to live on, but the poor soldier has only 1*s.* a day, and he is sent into the market to compete against me and my comrades, because we have a man who is prepared to accept labour at 7*s.* a week less than we can live on.

765. You are aware, are you not, that the vast majority of men are not pensioners but reservists?—Quite so now.

766. Do they who have borne the burden and heat of the day for you and me come back and have an equal chance with us who have been in the labour market all this time?—Yes, and I can prove it too. At the docks we have a tremendous number of reservists who are good hard-working men, and members of the organisation.

767. And you cannot conceive a case in which a man requires help to start him in life when he comes home, can you?—Not if he is a healthy man, if he is physically fit; if he is not the country ought to maintain him; that is my argument.

768. Suppose that his constitution is injured, not ruined, but injured, so that he can do three-quarters of a day's work?—They do not take you on for three-quarters of a day.

769. So that while you can earn 6*d.* an hour, he can only earn 4*d.* an hour; what is to happen to him if he cannot earn the full market wage?—He ought to fall on the resources of the country; he ought to be pensioned off.

770. Even though he can do a great deal of work?—Probably you can find some employment for him, and give him a living wage, give him something which will not pull the wages of the people down who are doing laborious work.

771. In that case you are quite prepared to concede the War Office trying to assist that man by finding him a situation for which he is suited, are you?—Quite so.

772. You have no objection, have you, to the War Office doing that for him?—Not at all. I am prepared to admit that they ought to be employed; but my first argument is this: that if a man is injured in health he ought to be maintained. It is my experience in Government establishments to find men who suffer from ague very much. I say they have caught that in the service of their country when employed to protect, I suppose, the class I am opposed to, as a class. Such men are sent to us and we have to keep them. I have seen men who suffer with liver complaint caught in India who are kept in Woolwich Arsenal, and it caused Lord George Hamilton once in the House of Commons to make a statement that out of charity these men were kept on. I say (and Mr. Woodall is here present and tells us that it is a commercial enterprise) that the country has no right to be burdened with these men who are kept in that capacity as workmen.

Captain Bethell.

773. Supposing an industrious working man chose to buy himself a pension which came into operation at the age of 30; there would be no objection to that man, if he liked, therefore taking a somewhat lower rate of wages, would there?—I should object to him taking a lower rate of wages.

774. You object, as belonging to a particular organisation, to any man taking a lower rate of wages than the organisation permits, do you?—Yes, I protest on the ground of common humanity.

775. Let me put this to you: a man may, if he chooses, buy himself a pension which comes into operation, say, at the age of 30 or 35; he is then able, in more advancing years, to work at less wages than his fellows can, is he not?—That is a question of thrift, is it not?

776. Not especially; I think you will see it bears upon this matter?—Because I cannot see how a working labouring man can be thrifty.

777. I believe it is a fact, however?—I cannot conceive it.

778. The point I want you to follow is that a man may do this so that in his more advancing years he is able to work for less wages than perhaps those who have not been thrifty in their younger years?—Yes.

779. Then a soldier who joins the Army receives a lower rate of wages than most workmen do, and, as a balance, he receives a pension at the end, does he not?—Quite so.

780. Is not that on all fours with the case of a man who chooses to buy himself a pension?—What you mean is this, that a pension means deferred pay, practically speaking?

781. Quite so?—Then he gets his deferred pay which you have been careful to lock up and keep the interest of. You say: "We will give you a pension"; and he comes into the labour market and says: "I have a pension; I am prepared to do that job for 4*s.* a week less than another man." What would be the spirit of the men who are working around him who have never received a pension. It would not be safe to receive an argument of that description. I think this, if a man has been thrifty and saved a little money he would never think of doing it; if he were a man he would never bring himself into competition with his fellow men to bring their wages down. If it was optional with the soldier he would have his pay every week. If you did not keep it for him, he would prefer to draw it every week, but you very kindly take care of it for him. You want to put it on the question of thrift with the soldier, do you?

782. No?—Because I say the soldier is not thrifty on the average.

783. My point is whether in the more advanced years of a man's life it might not be, and is not, advantageous for him to be able to work at a somewhat lower rate of wages than younger men, and able to do so because he has some other resources besides those which are paid to him in direct wages. In the case of labour that may be done, and is done I know to a certain extent, by buying Government pensions, or otherwise, and, in the case of the people of whom we are talking, it is done by Government pensions?—Quite so.

784. I do not see any difference in the two cases; do you?—I have never in my experience found a working labouring man buy a pension. A soldier, of course, earns his pension.

785. But you do not see any difference between tween the two cases, do you?—It is such a rarity that I do not think it is to be considered.

786. Some time ago you gave us an illustration of a sergeant who, with a considerable pension, was appointed at high wages to a particular job, and you thought it was unfair?—Yes.

787. And, in reply to the Chairman, you said that in your judgment a man who had a living pension ought not to be given any other appointment?—I say he ought not to be given a preference.

788. But you told the Committee before that a man who had a pension, but not sufficient to keep him, might be given employment, only it must be at the same rate of wages as any other person?—Quite so.

789. Then you are landed in this extraordinary position, are you not: that a man who has already got a pension is not to be given preference, but another person who has a pension rather below his is not to be allowed to take any employment except at the average rate of wages, thereby raising his wages to a higher sum?—There is this to be taken into consideration: the average pension is 1*s.* 2*d.* a day; a man cannot subsist upon that, and I protest against that 1*s.* 2*d.* a day being used against me by the employer to pull my wages down. In the other case he has 30*s.* a week, and he can exist on it. But taking the average dock labourer, it is unfair to him to allow a man with 30*s.* a week pension to be a labour master. Probably some of the men who had to work under him had not seen 30*s.* for the last three months for their total earnings in the river trades.

790. Are you of opinion that enlistment in the Army relieves competition in the labour market every year?—Yes, I should say it must do.

791. In that case, is there anything unfair in these men coming back to a market which has already been relieved by their absence?—Not at all, if they will come under fair terms; if you will not use their money.

792. Is it unfair to let them make use of their services; they have relieved the labour market by their absence, and during their absence they have gained a certain provision; is there anything unfair, after all, if those men choose, in their coming back and competing in the labour market with the provision they have earned?—I do not mind the provision they have earned, but I do not want that provision used as a means of pulling my wages down.

793. But do you think there is anything unfair in their coming back to a market which has been relieved by their absence, and allowing them to make use of the provision they have gained in any way they like?—Yes; if it is to pull my wages down I am against it, because you see the unfairness of the thing. If a man has 3*s.* 6*d.* a week, he can exist on wages of 3*s.* 6*d.* a week less than another man.

Mr. Brookfield.

794. I was very pleased to hear what you said in approval of everyone serving under arms; do you think that is an opinion generally held by the class you represent?—We have a member of our organisation who once took on drilling soldiers previous to the Trafalgar-square riots.

Mr. Brookfield—continued.

795. With the object of breaking the law?—No; with the object of protecting themselves against the law.

796. When we talk about universal repugnance to conscription, do you think it is the case that it exists?—It is a thing which is never debated amongst workers. I have come into contact with a lot of working men, and you very rarely find that they take much interest in the Army, very little, unless probably they have a brother who is a soldier or a father who was a soldier. Otherwise I do not think they are much interested in the Army; they have enough to interest themselves in the daily warfare of life.

797. Do you think it would lead to bitter opposition if they were required to serve two or three years with the colours?—I could not say.

798. You would not disapprove of it yourself, would you?—Myself, I would not; I think it would be advantageous for everyone to be acquainted with the use of arms. I was a volunteer myself once.

799. You are aware that universal service exists in the continental armies, are you not?—Yes.

800. Are you aware that, in theory, we have universal service with regard to the Militia in England; that you, for instance, are liable to serve in the Militia, but you are never asked to do so; are you aware of that?—No.

801. Do you think generally amongst working men there would be more repugnance to doing a little annual service in the Militia, or to doing three years, and getting it over, in the Army?—I am reluctant to give an opinion on that, but for myself I say I am not against everyone learning the use of arms; that is, speaking personally. I am not against learning the use of arms; it might be useful.

Mr. Benson.

802. Do you object to any preference being given to reserve soldiers, say, by the Post Office, for instance, in the employment of rural postmen?—I object to any preference at all.

803. Would you altogether object to the idea that a soldier is entitled to any special favour because he has served the State?—Quite so.

804. You would say that civilian labour is just as honourable, would you?—Quite so.

805. And that the soldier served his country because he liked the work and was paid for it?—Quite so; there is no preference at all to be given.

806. You will agree, will you not, that the Government, in employing men, ought to take considerable thought for their welfare, or to try to consider their lasting welfare as much as the private employer would. Now here, every year the Government induce a number of young men to enter the Army, and to enter it under such conditions that the great majority of them will find that occupation come to an end when they are about 26. Therefore, while they are still young and able-bodied, they will find themselves thrown on the world with a certain disadvantage in getting employment afterwards?—Not at 26.

807. Surely the soldier who has been withdrawn from civil life cannot so readily obtain employment on his return to it?—On the average

he is a smarter man than the ordinary civilian; he has gone through the gymnasium.

808. That is a question upon which we have had some evidence. Supposing it was made clear that reservists, as a class, did find a difficulty in getting fit positions in civil life on their leaving the service with the colours, would you not say, if that could be proved, that the Government would be under some responsibility to try and make things easier for them, if it could do so, without dragging down the ordinary rate of wages?—No; I cannot change my opinion that there should be no preference given to the reservist.

809. May I take a parallel case. The Ordnance Survey at Dublin, at any rate (I am not sure about Southampton), employ a large number of boys to do a certain work, and the terms of their employment are that at a certain age they are dismissed from that particular work; I think at the age of 18; but there are a certain number of vacancies in other classes of work which is men's work and not boys' work, and the Ordnance Survey consider themselves under an obligation to those boys; if they have men's work to give them they should give it to them in preference to men coming from outside. Do you think they are wrong in that?—You mean if the boys have been in the service and become men?

810. Yes?—I should give them the preference; I say that is perfectly honest. What I complain of in the Ordnance Factories is, that they will not give promotion to the employees who have served faithfully; they bring in a sergeant major over their heads. I agree if there have been boys in the employment and there are vacancies for men's employment, the boys should have it, but not at reduced wages. If they do men's work they should get men's wages.

811. If you take the Government services generally, including the Army, Post Office, and numerous other kinds of employment that there are under Government, is it an unreasonable thing that the Government should prefer to continue to employ the men who have served it up to the present in the Army?—I am not against it at all. The majority of men belonging to our society in Woolwich Arsenal are short-service system men, and I have nothing at all to say against them. They are good strapping chaps when they come out, and, as I say, with regard to dock work you will find short-service men applying for work every morning at the docks and getting it.

Mr. Benson—continued.

812. Then it comes to this, does it not, that the Post Office should give preference to the reservist?—I do not believe in preference to the reserve soldier; but if a boy has been employed, and becomes past the age of boyhood, and there is a vacancy for a man, if he is capable of doing man's work and getting man's money, he ought to have it in preference to a stranger being taken from outside.

813. But it is much the same thing whether he is 18 or 26 if he has been in the employment of the Government, is it not?—Quite so.

814. And the Government should continue to employ him, you think?—Quite so.

815. And it makes no difference, does it, whether he is all the time under the same Government Department?—Yes, I must object to that.

816. Is that where you draw the line?—Yes, with the Army.

817. And would you draw that line just the same even if it were proved to you that his reserve pay was not taken into account in fixing his wages?—Quite so, I should still draw the line.

818. Should you say that, as a matter of fact, men on leaving the service with the colours do find a difficulty in getting employment?—No; as far as the short-service system men are concerned I think, if they are willing to work, they stand the same opportunity as the ordinary civilian, and I do not think there is any preference one way or the other. That is as to short service; but, as I have said before, if men have got a sergeant major's pension in the Army and retire with it they should not come into undue competition as they do. They do, because if there is a job with responsibility attached to it they get the preference. That is my personal experience in Government establishments, and I say that a man who has served his country there as a civilian, if he is capable of doing the job, ought not to be ousted and a man get the preference with a good pension. The civilian would probably never earn a pension at all, because you have abolished pensions in civilian establishments, and he has nothing at the end of his life, only the workhouse. That is all the workman has; the soldier has his pension; and because he gets his pension he gets a higher wage. I am speaking now only of non-commissioned officers, not privates.

Mr. WILLIAM KEY, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

819. You, I believe, come from Sunderland?—Yes.

820. And you are a contractor there for Government stores, are you not?—Yes.

821. Do you hold the position of trustee to the North of England Sailors' and Firemen's Society?—Yes.

822. And have done so for about eight years?—Yes.

823. Have you attended a good many Trades Union Congresses?—Yes.

Chairman—continued.

824. And are you prominently identified with the labour movement?—Yes.

825. Do you come here to-day to speak officially on behalf of the Parliamentary Committee of the Trades Union Congress?—Mr. Samuel Woods asked me to come here to-day.

826. Mr. Samuel Woods is the secretary, is he not, of the Parliamentary Committee of the Trades Union Congress?—Yes.

827. Are you aware of the general purposes of

of the inquiry upon which this Committee is engaged?—Yes.

828. Namely, to see how far the Government has been able to assist retired soldiers and sailors to employment in civil life, and whether their operations in that respect ought to be extended or not. What has been your experience as to the attitude of trades union workmen with regard to the employment of retired soldiers and sailors?—As a rule it has been favourable; that is, on condition that the soldier or sailor did not want to work for under wages, and the men, you may rest assured, never attempt to go for under wages; it is simply the bait thrown out by the employer, who attempts to fling into his face that he has a pension and he ought to be content with less wages. We find that very often to be the complaint of both soldiers and sailors.

829. You object, do you, to wages being beaten down by a man being given less wages than he can earn because he has either a pension or a reserve pay?—Certainly I do.

830. Taking the case of a soldier or sailor who through exposure to bad climate or hardship endured in the public service cannot earn the proper trades union wages, what do you say should be the attitude of the Government towards him?—The attitude of the Government towards him ought to be to keep him as comfortably as it is possible for a man to be kept. If a man has lost his health whilst in the service of his country and in defending its rights, I say the Government ought to keep that man as comfortably as it is possible to keep him.

831. Taking first of all the case of a man whose health is ruined, what you say applies to him, does it not?—Yes.

832. But taking the case of a man whose health is not ruined, but who is injured, who could work at 4*d.* an hour, when a man who is not injured would earn 6*d.* an hour, what would you say?—I think there are places such as the Post Office, and certain places in the Civil Service, such as messengerships, which might be found for these men, I think, if they can work. The only way really to solve the unemployed problem is by work, not by charity.

833. Then do I understand that you admit the responsibility of the State towards these men?—Yes.

834. That you have no objection to, and you believe that trade unionists generally have no objection to, the Government doing all they can to assist these men to suitable work, provided that they do not thereby beat down the market rate of wages?—Quite so.

835. That being your opinion, I take it that you think that the working-class community of this country owes a certain responsibility to the men who have taken on their shoulders the work of national defence, which in France and Germany falls on every able-bodied man?—A very great responsibility.

836. Let us take the case of sailors first of all; when sailors leave the Navy, do they find it easy or difficult to get civil employment?—For a time they find it very difficult to get into the merchant service, which is the place they generally go to. You will find from statistics that there are very few naval seamen in the wor-houses as compared with the old soldier. The naval seaman, of course, feels the work on a merchant ship very awkward at first, owing to the few men on board the ship, in comparison to the number he has been with, but after a trip or two that wears off, and he becomes the best sailor we have in the merchant service.

837. Then it comes to this, does it not, that the ex-sailor has a great advantage over the ex-soldier, because he has learnt a profession?—Yes, very great, and I certainly think if we could solve the economic problem in connection with soldiers it would be a great advantage to the soldier and to the nation.

838. May I ask how it could be done?—I will tell you. Round all the barracks, as you are aware, there are large walls constructed; these walls are standing there for no purpose whatever, as a rule, but simply to barricade the men in. I think if you were to put, say, pens up for poultry round the barrack walls, which would not interfere with the parade ground, the five millions of money which we pay for the importation of eggs and things into this country would soon be saved. A great deal of waste ground could be utilised in that way, and it would not interfere with the space for drill.

839. Would that enable them to earn their living after their discharge?—Yes, because if they learned in the Army how to look after poultry, which is a simple thing, they would have something to do on leaving. It would be very cheap, because it is my experience that there is a very large amount of off-fall from a barrack table, and with the small expenditure of money which would be necessary for food for fowls I think the whole five millions of money which we pay for importation could be saved to this country within 10 years.

840. Of course the usual form of what I may describe as technical education that has been suggested for the soldier is rather that of learning some handicraft; would the trades union leaders and the Trades Union Congress object to soldiers learning trades in their leisure moments?—Not the slightest, so long as they do not try to reduce the wages.

841. You state in the memorandum you have been kind enough to furnish to the Committee that you have reason to believe that retired soldiers make good policemen?—Very good policemen.

842. Good soldiers of course make good policemen, do they not?—Undoubtedly a good soldier makes a good anything.

843. And do you think that is quite a proper method of employing him?—Yes. I may say that during the last eight years I have been myself instrumental in getting 200 soldiers employed in various capacities, in stores, breweries, and so forth, and I should think 97 per cent. of them have given entire satisfaction.

844. Will you tell the Committee shortly the capacities in which you got these men employment?—Such employment as washing casks in breweries and in grocers' wholesale stores, packing groceries; and I have got several of them into tobacco manufactories.

845. In recommending these men did you act on private knowledge you had of them, or did you go by their Army characters?—Both. I always believe in applying to the adjutant to see how he recommends the man. Even if I have known the man a number of years I take the precaution, for fear anything has happened. I think it is best to be backed up by the adjutant's certificate; but, as I have said, 97 per cent. of those I have recommended have given satisfaction to those who have employed them.

846. You think, I understand, that the time for entering the Civil Service should be extended for soldiers and sailors who retire, seeing that they are and have been Government servants?—Yes.

847. To what branches of the Civil Service do you allude?—I take it for granted that a non-commissioned officer, or a man who has a first-class certificate, is qualified to fill almost any branch of the Civil Service. I think the examination for the first-class certificate is stringent enough. I would have no fear in saying that if I had a first-class certificate I would be prepared to go to either Oxford or Cambridge and take any degree required within a short time.

848. In your experience, has education in the Army very much improved?—Yes, and is likely to do so; but I think there should be even greater facilities thrown out for getting first-class certificates.

849. Greater facilities for the men to educate themselves, do you mean?—Yes.

Colonel Murray.

850. In what direction do you think that education ought to take place?—Mathematics and general topics of education.

851. Not industrial or technical education?—I would certainly give a first-class certificate for technical education.

852. Do you think that that sort of education would give a man a good chance of earning a livelihood when he leaves the service?—It would; in my opinion it would give him an extraordinary good chance.

853. More so than the education of mathematics, writing, and so on?—I would not like to say more so; because you see the unemployed army is swelling day by day, so that it becomes, in my opinion, a necessity for the Government to take us all in hand and find employment.

854. You spoke of utilising the space at present given up to the parade grounds for the breeding of fowls, did you not?—Yes.

855. Have you considered that it is necessary that troops should parade and that they should have a parade ground?—I think you misunderstood me; I said it would not interfere with the parade ground. The amount of space which would be taken up for the breeding and rearing of poultry would not interfere with the parade ground, because if you take the circumference of the squares where the men parade, they never as a rule go right up to the walls, and there are in fact miles and miles of walls in this country standing for no purpose at all except that they are there to keep the public from approaching the barracks.

856. Do you consider that any preference should be given to the soldier who has retired from the service over men who remain in civil life, and who do not join the Army or Navy?—I certainly think his services ought to be taken into consideration; that is my own opinion.

857. For what reason?—Because he has gone and defended the honour and integrity of his country on a very small wage. That ought to be a very serious consideration, I should think.

858. Are you aware that many thousands of men a year relieve the labour market by joining the service?—Yes.

859. And that only about half the number of those men come back to the labour market; that a great many of them lose their lives in the service, or lose their health to such an extent that they are not able to join the ranks of the employed afterwards?—Quite so.

860. And for those reasons do you consider that they should have preference on leaving the service over those who have had better chances of obtaining and keeping their employment in civil life?—I do

861. Do you think that the labour associations recognise that?—Yes, they do. The only condition of unions is that they shall not work for less wages.

862. You think, do you, that they recognise that preference should be given to the soldier for those reasons?—Yes.

863. And that they would make so far a sacrifice that the soldier should have a preference over civilians?—A great number would, but I must say there are a large number in the labour world who do not believe that; but for myself, I do think preference should be given to the soldier.

864. Do you think that is the general opinion?—I should not like to say it is the general opinion, because the cry has been always about the soldier, because he has his pension, taking less wages; they do not blame the soldier or sailor for it, but they blame the employer.

865. I was not speaking of the point of less wages, but merely the point that preference should be given to the soldier, who has had less opportunity of gaining employment from having spent his time in the Army?—I should think the majority of the workers are favourable to that idea.

Lord Talbot.

866. Do you think, as a fact, that the reservists coming into the labour market have reduced wages?—Yes, in certain cases; that is, where the employer of labour who, for instance, has been paying a man 30*s.* a week, knows a soldier has 10*s.* or 12*s.* a week pension; as soon as he knows that he says, "I will make your wages up to 30*s.* a week including your pension."

867. Do you think that has been confined to individual employers of labour, or has it extended to large numbers?—A very large number.

868. Employers who employ one or two men only?—Employers who employ more than one or two men; that has been my experience.

869. Do you think it has affected big concerns, such as railway companies?—I do not think the railway companies, as far as I have been able to trace, have acted in the same way.

Captain Bethell.

870. When you spoke of the men who left the Navy,

Navy, did you speak chiefly of the 10 years' men, or the pensioners?—The pensioners, as a rule.

871. Men of about the age of 38 and 40?—Yes.

872. Do you know anything about the considerable number of men who leave the Service at the termination of their first engagement; that is to say, 10 years?—Yes.

873. They would be men of about 30, would they not?—Yes.

874. Do you get many of those?—Yes.

875. You are aware that they have no pension, are you not?—Quite so.

876. And, therefore, there is not quite the same difficulty raised with respect to them as there is with respect to the reservists, is there?—No.

877. Are the 10 years' men good men?—They are not so good as the long service men.

878. Not so steady?—Not so steady.

879. Of course, they have not got the experience, have they?—Quite so, and, as a rule, they are not so steady.

880. Do you think they readily find employment?—Not readily.

881. Do not the owners of the merchant ships care to have them?—It is not the owners, as a rule; the owner, as a rule, very seldom interferes. The captains do not care a great deal about them. They call them "Grumbling Jack"; that is to say, they grumble on account of their having been with so many more men, and where the work is much lighter than it is in the merchant service.

882. Supposing those men are taken, after a time do they do the work?—Yes, after they have been a few trips.

883. There is a good deal of complaint from the merchant service about not being able to get men, is there not?—Yes.

884. And you would have thought that men coming from the Navy, after having shaken off the first feeling of not getting quite so much assistance, would take readily to this work, and be readily employed?—That is the reason they have not been readily taken.

885. Do the pensioners get readily taken up?—As a rule.

886. Of course they are a very much better class of men?—Yes, much better.

887. Do you know a good deal about them?—Yes.

888. Should you say that a pensioner from the Navy, provided he is in tolerably good health, can usually find employment?—As a rule.

889. You said just now that you agreed with other evidence which has been given before the Committee that the pensions which men come with ought not to be allowed to interfere with the market wage?—Quite so.

890. But I mark that you suggest that soldiers might be made a productive agency, by poultry farming, and so on?—Yes.

891. Does it not occur to you that that would be interfering with the labour market of small farmers and others?—No, because this is the way I look at it: According to the Board of Trade we pay about 5,000,000*l.* per annum for importing these very things, and I say if our soldiers can do us anything like a service by producing 5,000,000*l.* worth of food, they certainly would not interfere with our small farmers. They would interfere to a certain extent with the importation and the shipowners who bring those eggs and fowls to this country, but the result would be greatly to the advantage of this country.

892. Surely if these persons have buildings for nothing, and a considerable portion of their food for nothing, they could raise their poultry and produce eggs at considerably less expense than our farmers can, and they would be on the footing of those people abroad who are able to put their products on to our markets, would they not?—But the soldiers could sell as cheap or cheaper than the foreigner.

893. My point is rather that in one case you are objecting to outside resources interfering with the labour market, and in the other it appears to me you are recommending, in the case of farmers, the very thing you object to in the case of the labour market?—There is something in your point, but it is a thing we have to give and take a good deal in. I hold that all the money should go to the soldier; if he makes a million of money it should go towards the soldiers for the betterment of the pensions by improving them in technical education.

Captain Fenwick.

894. You have peculiar facilities, have you not, for understanding this question as not only one of the leading trades unionists of the north, but as also knowing a great deal about soldiers from your position as contractor for the Government stores?—Yes.

895. And you come into contact with soldiers, do you not?—Yes, a great deal.

896. From what you have seen of soldiers, do you think that during the last few years the characters of soldiers have been improved?—Considerably.

897. As regards steadiness of conduct, not drinking so much, and in education?—Yes, considerably.

898. You said just now that you thought a man who had a first-class certificate was a man who was fit almost for any post?—Yes.

899. The Committee were told the other day that it had been suggested that a first-class certificate should be regarded as equivalent to a Civil Service examination for the junior clerks; do you agree with that?—Yes, and for a lot of the senior clerks, too.

900. You know a great deal about the Firemen and Seamen's Union, do you not?—Yes.

901. Have you in that body many retired naval men?—Yes, a great number.

902. Are they all willing to join that union if they intend to continue a seafaring life?—Yes, if they intend to go into the merchant service as a rule they make extraordinarily good union men.

MEMBERS PRESENT:

Mr. Benson.
Captain Bethell.
Mr. Brookfield.
Captain Fenwick.
Captain Grice-Hutchinson.
Colonel Lockwood.
Colonel Murray.
Lord Edmund Talbot.
Mr. Woodall.

MR. BROOKFIELD IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. WILLIAM HENRY SHARPINGTON, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

903. Do you represent the firm of Martin, Wells, & Co., builders and contractors?—Yes.

904. They are, I believe, what are called Army contractors?—Yes; I suppose we are classed amongst the leading Army contractors in the building trade.

905. Are they some of the largest employers in that kind of work?—Yes, amongst the largest employers of that description of labour.

906. Where is the head-quarters of your place of business?—Aldershot.

907. You hold, do you not, what is called the triennial contract at present?—We are the triennial contractors for some part of the Government contracts at the present time.

908. You have also, I believe, other important works on hand?—Yes, all sorts of works.

909. Can you tell us, roughly, what number of men you employ in all the different branches of your work, civilian and otherwise?—We recognise all our men as civilian. I dare say we employ 1,700 to 1,800 a week.

910. On weekly wages?—Yes.

911. What kind of labour would that be; is it skilled and unskilled?—Yes, all descriptions of labour; we have every description of work connected with the building trade.

912. Including carpentering and joinering?—Yes, that is one of the principal things.

913. Have you given any attention to the subject this Committee is enquiring into, namely, facility of employment for reserve and discharged soldiers and sailors?—Yes. Previously to holding the position I do now as London manager to Messrs. Martin, Wells, & Company I had carried out several large works in London for them as general foreman, and therefore, of course, I have had a great deal to do with men.

914. Have you given special attention to the question of finding employment for soldiers and sailors; have you noticed among your employés the proportion of old soldiers and sailors; you know which are the old soldiers and sailors, I suppose?—Yes.

915. What is the general conclusion you have come to as to the ease or difficulty with which they obtain situations?—There are several things that bar an ex-soldier or an ex-sailor from getting an ordinary job, because, I suppose, if you took the average of one in a hundred among mechanics, that is about all you would find that have left the Army.

916. But with regard to unskilled labour, what would you say?—With regard to unskilled labour, the men who leave the Army are not adapted to the building trade; for instance, they are not adapted to climbing ladders and walking along scaffold boards.

917. That would not apply, of course, to sailors?—No. I have done a 50,000*l.* job in Leman-street, Whitechapel, for the Wholesale Co-operative Society, and I had a good many sailors as scaffolders and hoisters. Of course they get about the building like a cat; in fact, they are a bit in front of the other men.

918. My question was, do soldiers and sailors find any special difficulty in getting employment?—No; no special difficulty.

919. They are taken on on their merits?—They are taken on on their merits. If a soldier or sailor came and asked me for a job, I should not ask him if he was a soldier or a sailor; but if he could do his work, there would be no further notice taken.

920. You said soldiers were not well adapted to the building trade; would you explain what renders them unfit for that sort of employment?—They cannot bend themselves about like ordinary builders' labourers; you never see a soldier carrying a hod; they cannot put themselves in the shape to lift it.

921. You think his Army training rather unfits him than otherwise?—A soldier looks very nice in a building, no doubt; but when you come to ask him to work, he cannot turn himself about so quickly, and is not so pliable as ordinary men. It may be the drilling.

922. You have not noticed any difference in quite recent years since the stiffness of military drill has been greatly relaxed?—It may have been greatly relaxed, but I can tell a soldier on any job. If you took me to a job I could pick out the man who had been a soldier.

923. You could pick him out in an unfavourable sense, you mean?—What I mean is, that you could tell a man by the way he goes to work. If you see men who are carpenters, anyone who understands his business knows whether a man is a good carpenter; and it is the same with labourers and bricklayers. There are a good many classes of labourers.

924. Your

924. Your general conclusion is, that a soldier's military training rather goes against him on his merits as a mechanic after he leaves the Army?—Yes, I am of that opinion.

925. At the same time, you always try to find employment for him if you can?—Yes, we always try to find employment for him if we can.

926. With regard to sailors, your experience is rather different, I understand?—Yes.

927. Because they can climb about so well on the scaffolding, and so on?—Yes, they can walk about on planks and boards where a soldier could not look at it.

928. It is a very common thing for sailors to be employed on scaffolding work to the exclusion of men who have never been to sea?—I do not think so.

929. Can you tell us anything with regard to wages; as to the effect of the recent trades union action, and the action of this House; can you mention any results of that action in your business?—Yes, the result has been that we have been obliged to post this notice up in our works: "Notice.—Extract from Resolution of the House of Commons in regard to the rates of workmen's wages, dated 13th February 1891: 'That, in the opinion of this House, it is the duty of the Government, in all Government contracts, to make every effort to secure the payment of such wages as are generally accepted as current in each trade for competent workmen.' In accordance with the above resolution, all contractors for War Department works are bound by the terms of their contracts with the War Department to pay all workmen employed under those contracts the rates of wages (without any deduction) current for competent workmen in the respective localities where the work is performed, and to put up a copy of this notice, prominently, in all workshops, yards, enclosures, pay offices, &c., where work for the War Department is carried on. By order of the Secretary of State for War."

930. Does that handicap you, or otherwise, in connection with the employment of soldiers and sailors?—Yes, it does handicap us.

931. In what respect?—In this respect: We are compelled to pay the standard rate of wages, and it is our duty to get the best men for that money. The mere fact of having to pay this rate of wages compels us to have good men. We have to try and get as much work out of them as we can.

932. You must get value for your money?—Yes.

933. Taking the case of a soldier with a pension, or a reserve man with a small retaining fee of 6*d.* a day, does the receipt of that money have any effect in this connection?—It does have a great effect at the time when he takes his quarterly pension.

934. Going to that question, do you think that the fact of the soldiers getting their money in a lump on a fixed quarter-day has a demoralising effect?—Yes. I have had soldiers working for me, as I have said. Of course there are certain jobs about a building that sometimes we can find employment for soldiers upon. For instance, if a job is getting finished and there is no dangerous work about it, we could put soldiers on for cleaning out the place. They are all right until they come to pension day, and then we do not see them for a bit. When they come back, and you say, "This is nice goings on," they will say, "Well, governor, we do not very often get so much money at one time; we must do something with it."

935. Can you suggest anything better in place of the present system?—If these men had their money in smaller sums, of course they would be able to lay it out to better advantage; they would not have so much money at one time.

936. You would propose to pay them their reserve money more frequently?—Yes.

937. Would your remark about the men being apt to go on the loose, as it is called, when they have been paid their reserve money, apply to them all, or to the majority, or to what proportion?—To the majority.

938. What sort of a majority; two-thirds, should you think?—I daresay it would be about two-thirds; it just depends upon what class of men they are; there are so many different classes of men.

939. Do you ask for any certificate of character on employing these men?—No.

940. Do you make a distinction between a non-commissioned officer and a private?—No, neither do they anywhere in the building trades. If I lose my reference I should have to go back and try to work up to it again. We have to get it on our own merits; it is the same everywhere.

941. On the whole, your firm is, I understand, very well-disposed towards assisting the object of the Government in providing employment for deserving soldiers and sailors; but you find certain difficulties placed in your way?—Yes. I will explain the difficulty in this way: Supposing we have a soldier taken on suitable for a job—they are not, as I say, suitable for all jobs. If you ask the soldiers themselves they will tell you they are not capable of doing the same work as men who have been doing that work all their lives and never been doing anything else. Sometimes we have to have men on day-work; and when the men are on day-work, of course it makes no difference what we pay them; in fact, the more wages we pay them the better it is for the contractor. But if the men are on day-work for two days, and on measured work the other four days of the week, that is where it does not suit the contractor.

942. Will you make that a little clearer; is the measured work the same as piecework?—No; for instance, if you gave us an order to cut an opening through that partition and put up a pair of doors and linings round it, and architraves, you would give us an order for that, which would be measured, on completion, and paid according to the schedule of prices.

943. That would be the class of work included in what are called the triennial contracts?—Yes.

944. Would you explain also your observation that the larger the wages when it was day-work the better for the contractor?—The contractor is allowed 10 per cent. profit on his day-work, on the actual money he pays for day-work; so that if he paid a man 1*s.* an hour, it would be better for him than if he paid the man 6*d.*, for he would get 10 per cent. upon the 1*s.* instead of 10 per cent. upon 6*d.*

Captain Bethell.

945. That depends upon the amount of work that is done, does it not?—No, when they are taken on day work it has nothing to do with the question how much work they do.

Mr. Woodall.

946. When you engage old soldiers do you generally put them to work upon what you may call measure and value work, rather than upon the contract job?—Supposing we employ old soldiers or militiamen, and I may say we employ a good many militiamen, but I understand you are not going into the question of militiamen.

947. They belong to another class, do they not?—Yes.

948. I suppose you would say a militiaman was familiar with his own particular kind of work from which he was only taken away for certain periods?—Yes.

949. Therefore, what you said about the particular effect of military drill unfitting men for building work does not apply to militiamen?—Quite so.

950. When you were speaking of the unfitness of soldiers in consequence of their military experience, were you speaking more particularly of men who have to carry heavy weights?—No, I meant any description of work in the building trade.

951. But there are occupations in which you would find perhaps a soldier preferable to a man who has merely had civilian experience, are they not?—I am sure I could not mention any part of the building trade where they could fit themselves in.

952. Do you not employ men sometimes as timekeepers and watchmen?—Yes, we have had military men on for that sort of job.

953. I understand in those occupations, at all events, a soldier would be at no disadvantage in comparison with a civilian?—Not at all.

954. In such occupations, for instance, as looking after horses and driving carts?—You cannot place reliance upon them for driving horses and carts.

955. In what respect?—They are all right till pension day comes round, and then you lose them and have the horse in the stable for three or four days until they have spent all their money.

956. Have you ever tried your personal influence in advising the men to avoid such indiscretion?—I have told them all I can tell them; but the fact of any man having a lot of money at one time, when he is not used to having a lot, upsets him a bit.

957. Have you any idea of how many men who have been in the Army are now in the employment of Martin, Wells, and Company?—I should think about 70 to 80.

958. Are those men who are permanently settled about Aldershot, in Aldershot town, and round about?—Yes.

959. Is there any deficiency of general civilian labour there?—There is not a lot of civilian labour about there generally; there has been a good deal lately on account of the reconstruction of the camp.

960. Would you say that the proportion of old soldiers available in and about Aldershot is larger than you would find in London?—Yes, considering the size of the place.

961. So that in spite of these considerations, which rather prejudice them in your mind, you still do find employment for a number of old soldiers?—Yes.

962. And your firm is anxious to continue to do so?—Yes; I daresay I have got 10 or 12 on in London at the present time.

963. You were saying just now that under the operation of the House of Commons Resolution, as enforced in your contracts, you think it hard you should be required to pay the full current rate to men who, in consequence of their training, are not so well fitted for the work as an ordinary civilian labourer?—Yes; and to meet that, our only chance is not to employ these men; to get rid of them and get men who are used to the trade. The thing speaks for itself. If you compel us to pay a certain fixed wage, there is only one thing for us to do, and that is to employ the best men we can for the money.

964. Paying a higher rate of wage, you naturally desire to get the best men you can get for the money?—Just so.

965. If you were allowed to pay a man what he was worth in your judgment, you would be willing to find employment for a larger number of these old soldiers?—Yes, and the men, as a rule, would be satisfied also, because they want the work; there is no doubt about it.

966. I do not know whether you have formed any opinion on the question of a living wage, but I suppose you would hold that a man drawing a smaller wage, supplemented by his income for past services in the Army, would be in as good a position as the more competent man receiving the trade union rate?—He would be in a better position, because his would be a certainty where the other man's would be an uncertainty.

967. You think it is rather hard that he should be denied the employment for which he is fitted and for which you would be willing to pay the wages he is worth?—Yes.

Captain Grice-Hutchinson.

968. Do you get many applications from reservists for employment?—Yes; but we find the men that come with written applications, as a rule, are not fitted for us. We find men who come and ask on their own merits are much better than those who come with testimonials.

969. Do you mean with testimonials from their commanding officers?—Yes, or anybody else.

970. Do you think that reservists find it difficult to get employment on leaving the colours; do you think that many of them are out of employment?—I do not think there are many of them out of employment.

971. What branch of the service have you most applications for employment from; do you get many from the Engineers; the skilled branches?—Yes, sometimes.

972. Not so many as from the line or cavalry?—We have a good many from the guards; the Coldstreams, the Scots, and the Grenadier Guards; we have a good many applications from them.

973. When you get application for employment, do you make any inquiries as to whether the

the man had learned a trade before he enlisted?—No, we have no means of doing that.

974. You do not make any inquiries at all as to whether the man had been a bricklayer, for instance, before he enlisted?—No; if he comes and asks for a job, I say "What are you?" and he says, "I am a bricklayer," or it may be a mason, or a painter, and I send him to a job.

975. Would you do that in the case of an old soldier?—That is what we ask them.

976. Then you do ask them if they have a trade?—We ask what trade they are, what sort of job do they want. If they say they are bricklayers, or masons, or painters, we send them to that particular branch. We should not handicap a man by sending him to a branch he did not understand.

977. I understood you to say you employed reservists not so much on skilled labour as upon odd jobs?—Yes, because you cannot find a man who is capable of doing the skilled work.

978. If a man has been a bricklayer seven years before, when he first enlisted, surely he would know a trade?—Yes, but how many men can you find that have been seven years in a trade?

979. I mean a man who has been seven years in the Army, having been a bricklayer before he enlisted, do you think his knowledge of bricklaying would have so deteriorated during his time in the Army that his hand would have forgotten its cunning?—Yes, if he was in the army for seven years, and I was in my trade all the time, how could he expect to be the same as I should be; that is my meaning.

980. Do you think if facilities were given to men to keep up a trade in the Army, when they were with the colours, would that help them in getting employment when they left the colours and became reservists?—I could not say; I do not think so from my experience. I have had a good many young fellows working for me who have left me and gone into the Army; there are one or two in the engineers now, who had started learning a trade, but when a man has once learnt his trade he will not leave his trade to go into the Army.

981. But you say they do, as I understand?—No, I say they started learning a trade, and then went into the Army, but when a man has learnt his trade he will not leave it to go into the Army, unless he has some particular cause for doing so.

982. There are many cases where skilled artisans do enlist. What I want to know is this, if facilities were given to them to keep up the trade they had learnt before they had enlisted, would it be an additional recommendation in their favour, on seeking employment, to be able to say, when they left the Army, "I know just as much of my trade as I did when I enlisted"?—Yes, but I do not think that there are many that do know their trade when they go into the Army.

983. Supposing the men were given the opportunity of learning a trade when they were with the colours, would that be a step in the right direction; supposing they were taught carpentering or bricklaying, for instance?—If you want to teach bricklaying in the Army you would have to get a civilian to teach them to do it according to the civilian system; it would be no good teaching a man to lay bricks in the military style if he is to come out and work with civilians outside. But, as I say, it would not matter what a man had been if, when he asked for a job, and he comes on a job, he is competent to carry out the work he professes to do, he can go to work the same as other men, there is no stop or bar anywhere.

984. Do you think the trade unionists themselves look with any animosity on the old soldiers; one frequently hears remarks with regard to their cutting-down of the employment of other men, have you heard anything about that?—I may tell you that I belong to the Provident Institution of Builders' Foremen and Clerks of Works, but there is no trades union about that. I suppose we have got about 110 members all over London; they carry out different works and hold good positions, and have to be capable men before they can join this institution. It is no good any of our trade applying to our institution unless they are capable men. If we had anything to do with trades unions we could not serve our employers faithfully, and we could not look after our men properly; we are bound to walk on a line between the two.

985. What I meant was this, do you think the trades unions are at all jealous of old soldiers getting employment?—I do not know whether they are jealous or not, but this resolution I have referred to is all in favour of trades unions. This resolution knocks the soldiers out and puts the trade unionists in. It says in the notice, "All contractors for War Department works are bound by the terms of their contracts with the War Department to pay all workmen employed under those contracts the rates of wages (without any deduction) current for competent workmen in the respective localities where the work is performed."

986. You think that some exception should be made as regards reservists with regard to that resolution?—Yes; and I say that nine out of every 12 old soldiers would say the same as I say; they would be glad to accept the terms we could give them then.

987. You said that when a man went to draw his pension he went off on the spree, and you did not see him sometimes for two or three days?—Yes.

988. You said some alteration in the mode of payment would be desirable; can you give us any idea as to an alteration that you think would practically meet the case?—Supposing these men earn 24*s.* or 25*s.* a week, if they had their money once a month that would not be so bad as giving it to them once a quarter; that would enable them to lay it out a bit better.

Mr. Woodall.

989. Do you not think the man might then go on the spree four times a quarter instead of one?—Possibly he might, but it would not take him so long to get rid of his money.

Captain Fenwick.

990. I gather you do not attach much importance to the discharge characters you get with the men, as a rule; they are no true criterion of the man's worth?—In the building trade we never look at a man's character; his trade or his work is his character, whatever he does carries his character with him.

991. Have you noticed in the different branches of the service from which men come that certain branches produce more trustworthy men, and men who do not go on the spree, as you described, for instance; have you noticed any difference between the cavalry and the infantry in that way?—I have not noticed any difference. Of course since the pensions have been paid at the different post offices, no doubt that has been a great help to the men, because if the men are distributed about in different parts they do not all meet together and have a spree.

Colonel Murray.

992. You employ all soldiers who are useful in your work indiscriminately of the different branches of the service?—Yes.

993. Are you able to see any difference between the various branches in point of usefulness?—No, I cannot distinguish any difference between them.

994. I gather they are all working at about the same class of work, whether they come from the engineers or infantry, and do you not see any difference in the work?—No, I never could find any difference in them.

Captain Bethell.

995. Do the sailors, as a rule, whom you employ give trouble in the way of breaking out and that sort of thing?—No; I must say that sailors are a little more reliable than soldiers.

996. In point of steadiness, do you mean?—Yes; I do not know whether the ex-sailors we employ get their pension in the same way as the ex-soldiers.

997. Do you get applications from a good number of ex-sailors?—Yes, but you will understand the men never bring us any papers to tell us what they are.

998. You appear to be able to find out by seeing them work?—Yes; we can see from the way they go about their work. If you were to see a soldier and a sailor going up ladders you would see the difference at once.

999. You were saying just now that you thought that a reserve soldier might reasonably expect to be paid at lower wages than an ordinary workman; have you formed any idea roughly of what they are worth as compared with ordinary workmen—I mean as to what it would pay you to employ them at—would it be two-thirds of the ordinary pay?—I could not say; there are so many of them fitted for different classes of jobs.

1000. All you can say to the Committee is that upon the whole you think this class of man is not worth the ordinary wages of civilians?—Yes, I do say that.

1001. You could not give a rough idea of what the relative proportion would be?—It just depends upon what the man is. For instance, a man who has been in the Army for three years is no good to us at all; we had better have a man who has been in 14 years, or a good long time, than a man who has been in for so short a time as three years.

1002. Why is that?—I do not know; we find it is so.

1003. I should have thought the younger man would have been more adaptable?—He might be, but he is adapted to a good many things.

Lord Edmund Talbot.

1004. I gather you mean by that remark that if you are to employ soldiers at all you prefer linesmen to guardsmen, because it is the guardsmen who are chiefly three-years men?—Although I have had a great deal to do with them, I am sorry to say I hardly know the difference between the linesmen and guardsmen.

1005. You have had experience of three-years men?—Yes.

1006. And you say they are not satisfactory?—They are not, as a rule, satisfactory to us. I do not think the three-years men are quite so reliable as the men who have been in the Army longer.

Captain Fenwick.

1007. He has had fewer years of drill. Do you think he is more pliable than a man with longer service—No, I do not think so.

1008. In fact, you think he has all the defects that have come through having gone into the Army, and he has not got the compensating advantage of having had a long course of steady training?—Quite so.

1009. Roughly speaking, I understand you prefer civilians to old soldiers. If you had 10 vacancies for work and 20 men came, 10 civilians and 10 soldiers, you would at once take the civilians in preference, would you?—I do not know that I should. If I wanted 20 men and they were all soldiers and could go and do the work I should take them on; it would make no difference their being soldiers.

1010. But if you knew that 10 of the men who applied were old soldiers and 10 were civilians, you would rather try the 10 civilians first, would you not?—No, I should not necessarily. If they were likely-looking men they would have a chance. If you look at a man you can generally form some opinion of what he is made of.

Mr. Benson.

1011. You spoke about the clumsiness and inactivity of soldiers as shown in going up ladders and on scaffolding?—Yes.

1012. Do you think it is that they are lazy, or that they are absolutely stiffer physically than ordinary civilians?—I cannot explain it, but if you were to see an old soldier doing the work, or going up a ladder you would see directly he was not fitted for it.

1013. More so than in the case of a civilian?—A civilian would work into the job, it is his living; when he once becomes a tradesman, he is a tradesman, and he cannot shake it off as long as he lives.

1014. If you take a civilian at the same age, would he be just as awkward, do you think?—I think a civilian who had never been at the trade before would be just as awkward as a soldier would; would; but a soldier cannot go to hard work; if you were to put him in a trench with a couple of navvies and give him a shovel you would soon break him to pieces.

1015. Do you mean they are generally not strong men?—They might be strong, but they have not been trained to that sort of work.

Captain Bethell.

1016. You think a soldier cannot do this work for a time until he gets used to it a bit?—I have had soldiers come to work for me, and I have said "get into that trench;" the very first go off their hands go all to pieces, that is only temporary, but I think they have not got the stamina a good old navvy has.

1017. The evidence we had from several railway companies is that these old soldiers are not able to undertake the hard work at first, but if they get over the first year they are all right?—Of course it is unskilled labour; a man could almost learn to be a navvy in 12 months, it is not like learning a trade.

1018. You think it is their inability to do the work, rather than their unwillingness to do it?—Yes, for instance, if I were to go back to the trade myself, I should be a little bit awkward at first; that is all I mean.

Mr. JOSEPH RANDALL, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

1019. You belong to the firm of Kirk and Randall, army contractors?—Yes, I am the principal partner in that firm.

1020. You have heard the evidence of the last witness; will you explain how your business differs from his, and what class of work it is?—We are large public contractors; we do a lot of work for the railways and Government, more especially for railways; we had the Arsenal triennial contracts up six years running, and I have been frequently applied to to give employment to soldiers by officers in the Army, and by Colonel Hughes.

1021. The employment you have to give is of the same character in the building trade as that described by the last witness?—Yes, very similar.

1022. Generally speaking, is your experience the same as that of the last witness, that Army training unfits a man for work in the building trade?—Not exactly. I cannot see that a man who has been in the Army five or six years or 10 or 12 years is not better fitted for employment after the first month or two than the man who has not had that training. They are more attentive and better behaved, and, except in some cases, they are very steady. For instance, I have a coachman who has been in the Army; I have had him nearly seven years, and a better man could not be; he gets 35*s.* a week with his house, rent, and firing. Previously to that I had a soldier who was with me two years; he saved a little and set up a shop and is now employed in the Arsenal. I had another previously to him, but after a few months he took to drinking and I discharged him; we have had many old soldiers as drivers, and we have several of them now.

1023. As carmen?—Yes, we pay them 24*s.* a week for one horse, or if they have two horses they have 26*s.*

1024. In your works at Woolwich, I presume a large proportion of the soldiers you get have been gunners?—Many of them are from the Artillery.

1025. A large proportion of them would be gunners or drivers?—Yes, those that have been driving frequently make very good drivers.

1026. Your general opinion, I gather, of the old soldier is favourable? Certainly.

1027. Have you employed any sailors?—We have got two or three now; we have one in the joiners' shop; he has been there 12 or 18 months.

Chairman—continued.

1028. Has he given satisfaction?—He has given very great satisfaction.

1029. Have you come to any conclusion on the subject of the wage question?—That is a very serious question. I was president last year of the Master Builders' Association: of course it is a very great source of annoyance to us, the unions endeavouring to prevent the non-union men being employed; it is no business of ours whether a man belongs to a union or not, or what his political views are. Our foremen have strict instructions not to interfere or inquire about that; but supposing we are setting on, say, a dozen men at some particular job, when the men go to breakfast or dinner as the case may be these union men say, "where is your ticket;" that means the Federation ticket for which they have to pay, the labourer 2*d.* and the mechanics 3*d.* a week. They have to carry these tickets about with them, and these union men say, "where is your ticket"; perhaps the man says "I have not got one," or "I have left it at home"; then, when the foreman comes back from his dinner or breakfast, these union men say "If you do not discharge this man we are all going out"; that is the result of it, and this last two years it has been a continual source of annoyance. When you went to your job you might find it shut up and the men out until you gave way to these union men. No doubt you have seen in the papers paragraphs about Messrs Trollope's strike; we had three interviews with the union delegates, it was an unwritten law that there should be no difference between union and non-union men, but after three interviews we could find that except calling them blacklegs and words of that description they could give no argument why non-union men should not be employed except that they did not like it. We had three interviews and we found it was no use meeting them any more, so that excepting perhaps during the present month the regulations that were entered into in 1892 will not be in force; they are only in force on sufferance now.

1030. Can you give us any particulars as to the general scheme of agreement which you speak of as between the masters and the men?—Yes; in in 1892, or perhaps a little later than that, an arrangement was entered into and signed on behalf of the Master Builders' Association and the various labour delegates, that bricklayers should be paid 9½*d.* per hour, those that were cutting or setting arches should be paid 10½*d.*, the masons should be paid 9½*d.* per hour, and those that were fixing 10½*d.*, and the other trades, carpenters and all those trades, were to be paid 9½*d.* excepting plumbers, who were paid 10*d.* and 10½*d.*; and the labourers, 6½*d.* If a man was a scaffolder he was paid 7*d.* or 7½*d.* Then the agreement was that six months' notice should be given from the 1st November to terminate this agreement.

1031. Given by the employers?—By either side. We found such trouble with the union men and non-union men that on the 31st October last we gave them six months' notice to terminate the agreement, and that fell on the 30th April last; so that excepting that we are now adhering to the terms for the present month to see whether any settlement can be come to, we may say those rules are now from the 1st May non-existing except on sufferance, and of course we do not know whether there will be a strike or not, or a general lock-out. Of course that makes one very particular now in the contracts one takes.

1032. Will you tell us what proportion of the men you employ are unionists, and what proportion are non-unionists?—So far as we can average there is about one union man to about six non-union men.

1033. Can you say that the union man or the non unionist is the better worker?—Certainly not.

1034. You think there is no distinction?—Not a bit.

1035. One is no better than the other; it may turn out either way?—Quite so; of course there are a great many better men; a great many are worth 1*s.* an hour to you, and I contend if a man is worth 1 s. he has the right to be paid it; if he is worth 1*s.* 6*d.* he has a right to be paid 1*s.* 6*d.*; but there are inferior men too, and I do not see the right of a man to be paid 1*s.* or 10*d.* an hour if he is only worth 6 d. or 7*d.* an hour; I think that is where the union rates do a great deal of harm.

1036. You think it is tyrannical, in fact?—Yes, because we take no apprentices at the present day. To take an instance of what I mean: at our works at Horseferry-road, Westminster, we have two of our foremen's sons learning the trade of masons; we had no premium with them and we started them with a wage from the time they entered to learn the trade. The last year of their time they were receiving 8½*d.* an hour. The next day after they were 21 the union men, the masons, came to our foremen and said, "If these men do not have 9½*d.* an hour we shall leave." When I went to the works he told me what had happened and I said "I am not going to give them 9½*d.* an hour because they have not properly learnt their trade; when they are worth it we will give it them." The union men led these two boys such a life that they left. That is how it is so many of these men are compelled to join unions, because otherwise they are afraid of the intimidation.

Chairman—continued.

1037. Could you tell us what proportion of these men are old soldiers or sailors; do the old soldiers generally belong to the union?—I should say as a rule they do not.

1038. They could perhaps hold their own against any attempt to boycott or any attempt at intimidation?—Yes; supposing you have a 100 or 200 men on a job and there is a greater proportion of bricklayers or labourers (we have a lot of trouble with the labourers) belonging to the union, they are sure to try to get the ascendancy.

1039. The old soldier will hold his own better than the poor civilian, I presume?—Yes, as a rule the old soldiers do not belong to any unions unless they are compelled. Many of the men join the union simply for the sake of peace and quietness.

1040. Have you written from time to time to agencies for employing pensioners or old soldiers?—Yes, I like old soldiers as timekeepers, especially if they are sergeants.

1041. You have said you liked them as carmen?—Yes, and for timekeepers; for instance, I am going to take on two timekeepers, and I shall apply for sergeants or sergeant-majors, because if they are indiscreet in any way they lose their pension.

1042. Unlike the last witness you have found some advantage in distinguishing between non-commissioned officers and privates?—Certainly. One man we have had for 14 years.

1043. I have before me a paper giving various particulars as to the men in your employment; will you hand that paper in?—It is not complete; there are some men at Chatham for which I have not the return yet.

1044. Will it when completed be as long again as it is now?—I dare say it will.

1045. Will you have the paper completed and send it to us for the Appendix?—Yes; perhaps I might refer to our experience at Woolwich; of course during the Arsenal contract we had a considerable number of men there. We used to pay the labourers 6*d.* an hour, but unfortunately the Government did not pay them that rate; they only paid them 4½*d.*

1046. Will you explain that a little more in detail?—Before 1892 Woolwich was out of the London district as to the rate of wages. When the new rule came into operation they made it a 12 mile radius. At that time we had just taken a Government contract for three years. We had to increase all our men then a 1*d.* per hour, and, of course, we paid the bricklayers 9½*d.*, the carpenters 9*d.* and 9½*d.*, and the labourers 6*d.* and 6½*d.*, but the Works Department in the Arsenal paid their men something like 20 per cent. less wages than we did, and they selected, of course, the best part of the work to do themselves, and left the triennial contract with the most difficult part of the work. I do not want to go into that further in this inquiry.

Mr. Woodall.

1047. The work under the Works Department of the Government is more regular and constant, is it not?—I do not know exactly that it is so. Of course, continuity, as the director of contracts once explained, that may amount to something.

But

Mr. Woodall—continued.

But we have men that go about with us year after year. We have men in our employ who have been with us for more than 20 years, and if they have finished one job they go to another.

1048. Do you think the old soldier would prefer to work for you?—Yes, he would prefer to work for us because he gets better wages.

1049. You think he would not give the preference for any other cause to Government employment?—I do not know; I do not think he would.

1050. You do not think that he does, as a matter of fact?—No.

Colonel Lockwood.

1051. Can you state how many men you have, roughly speaking, employed generally?—On an average we have not less than 2,000. In another two months I shall have another 1,000 taken on for works just being entered into.

1052. Can you give me any idea of the percentage of old soldiers in that number?—I am, perhaps, going to set on about 500 men in Epping Forest for the East London Waterworks Company for two large jobs I have there; a great number of those may be men who have been in the Army.

1053. Probably a large proportion of them?—Yes, as navvies; but as a rule, with regard to the men serving the bricklayers, the hodmen, I should not think there is more than 2 per cent of Englishmen among them; it is turned over practically to the Irish; of all the hodmen in London I should not think there are 2 or 3 per cent. of English who carry the hod or have anything to do with it.

1054. You have stated already that you think as a rule the reservists and the old soldiers are not unionists?—Quite so.

1055. And therefore, owing to what I may call the inherent dislike of the unionists to anybody not a unionist being employed on the same job as themselves, the reservist and old soldier are placed at rather an unfair disadvantage?—Yes, and so is every non-union man.

1056. And that includes the reservists and old soldiers as a rule?—Yes, certainly.

1057. You say that the agreement you referred to between the masters and men lapsed at the end of April?—Yes.

1058. Have you had any trouble during this month with regard to that?—Not very much; they are keeping very quiet.

1059. Do you anticipate any fresh trouble?—We cannot tell; but we think they are waiting (and no doubt it is so) for the time when some contractor gets a job that has to be done very expeditiously, and that then they will take an opportunity of testing it; I signed, only yesterday, a contract for a job of between 50,000*l.* and 60,000*l.*, which I refused to do before simply because I declined to sign a contract that had not got a very wide arbitration clause, and a wide clause for strikes.

Mr. Woodall.

1060. What proportion of builders and contractors are included in the Master Builders' Association?—There are builders and builders; do you include in your question what we call jerry builders.

Mr. Woodall—continued.

1061. Yes, I mean builders who would undertake a contract of any kind, small or large?—So I understood; I should say more than half belong to it; I am excluding these jobbing builders because we do not receive them.

1063. Just as the non-union man would have the advantage of the higher wage secured to him by the combination?—Precisely so.

Captain Grice-Hutchinson.

1064. You say that in all probability there will be a good sprinkling of retired soldiers in these extra hands you are going to put on the work at Epping Forest?—Very likely.

1065. Do you make applications to any of the agencies for old soldiers?—No; I am going to start the job at once, and I have sent a foreman to-day to take notes of the job; the men will know about that quite as soon as we, and very likely to-morrow morning there will be 200 or 300 men round for the work, and we will take them on; no doubt there will be many old soldiers among them. You can tell a military man by his walk; I am going round the works every day of my life, and I soon get to know from experience what a man is.

1066. You said that you had applied to these agencies for timekeepers?—Yes; and I frequently get notes from officers in the Artillery saying, "Would you kindly give so-and-so a job," and we give him a trial.

Mr. Woodall.

1067. You were saying just now that these important works that you are about to undertake are somewhere near Epping Forest?—Yes; they are two jobs for the East London Waterworks Company.

1068. You would anticipate that among the navvies for whom you will there find employment, many would be men who had been in the Army?—Yes, mostly.

1069. Do you draw a distinction between a man recently discharged from the service, and a man who having served some time has been in the interval in civilian employment?—I do not know that one would do that. Of course, all the foremen we have are experienced men, and they see in a very few hours whether a man is capable of doing his work or not.

1070. You have had considerable experience of men who after leaving the Army have had employment in one or other of the Royal Factories, the Arsenal, for instance, at Woolwich, or at Enfield or Waltham?—Yes.

1071. I am sorry we have had to reduce our numbers at those factories at the present moment, and I am very glad to think that the men so discharged will find employment under you, but those would be men who to the qualities acquired in the Army have since added the advantage of civilian employment, and would be more exactly on the same level with the ordinary civilian labourers than the newly discharged men would be?—Yes, except that under Government employment they do not work them quite so hard as the builders or contractors work them.

1072. I am afraid the men do not admit that themselves, do they?—I speak from experience; I am a very early riser, and I have been in the Arsenal at 7 o'clock in the morning frequently.

1073. The Arsenal men do not begin work until 8 o'clock, do they?—Our men used to begin before that.

Captain Bethell.

1704. Have you any knowledge about the employment of ex-sailors on your work?—Yes, we have them frequently as scaffolders; they are very expert and quick.

1075. Do you get a good many applications from them?—Yes, we frequently employ them.

1076. Do you find they give satisfaction?—They are very good men indeed, very active men.

1077. As regards undergoing heavy manual labour, are they equal to it?—You have to pick the men out and assort them for various works. We have an ex-sailor now in the joiners' shop, for instance; the joiners are not allowed to go from their benches. This man has a board, and goes to the saw-mill and takes the stuff and gives it out; he also sees to their meals; they have a room set apart to have their meals in. He cleans up the workshop at night, and takes away the shavings.

1078. Are the sailors, from your experience, capable of sampling in with navvies in ordinary work?—No, I should say not.

Captain Grice-Hutchinson.

1079. Do you find that at pension day these old soldiers are apt to go on the spree and remain absent for a time?—I can speak from some experience, because our works adjoin the Arsenal at Woolwich, in what used to be at one time part of the Arsenal; High-street, Woolwich, now, is not a very respectable part, but we know the 1st of the month, there is generally a little commotion; it is the older men, I think, not the younger men.

1080. When you say once a month, do not these reserve men get their pay quarterly?—I sign these men's pension papers once a month.

1081. You are distinguishing between the pensioners and the reservists?—The reserve man has not so much to spend; he may get his pension quarterly very likely.

APPENDIX, No. 1.

PAPER handed in by Major General Sir Charles Wilson, 9 April 1895.

MEMORANDUM.

It is not easy to state how far the standard of education in the Army has been raised since the Education Act of 1870 was passed. There can be no doubt that it has been raised, especially in individual cases, and there is a steady and satisfactory increase in the number of men who hold First and Second Class Certificates. On the other hand, very little more than one-third of the men hold certificates of education, and since the abolition of the compulsory education of recruits there are no means of accurately ascertaining the standard of education of the remaining two-thirds.

In 1886, the last year in which the compulsory attendance of recruits at school was required, no less than 36·48 per cent. of the recruits failed to obtain a Fourth Class certificate of education. The standard of knowledge implied by the possession of this certificate was about equal to Standard II. in civil schools, which children of eight years of age are expected to pass. It is believed that the general standard of education attained by recruits is still low, and this is not surprising when it is considered that the recruit enlists five or six years after he has left school, and has had time to forget most of what he learned. It is to be feared that the standard of education in the Army will not be very materially raised until that in the classes from which recruits are drawn has been improved.

The state of education of the boys admitted to the Duke of York's Royal Military School during 1894, from all parts of the country, shows that the working of the Education Acts is still incomplete. Of 114 boys admitted from Civil Schools, between nine and 12 years of age, only five had passed the standard proper for their years, 65 were one standard below, and 44 were two or more standards below. In the same year 13 boys were admitted from Army Schools, and of these eight had passed the standard proper for their years, and five were one standard below. One boy from Civil Schools and four from Army Schools had passed Standard IV., and one from each had passed Standard V.

The requirement of a First Class Certificate for promotion to certain ranks and appointments, and the rule requiring the attendance at school of every non-commissioned officer until he obtains a Second Class Certificate, have tended to raise the standard of education in the non-commissioned ranks. But these certificates are of comparatively small value outside the ranks of the Army, and a First Class Certificate only exempts its holder from further examination in the case of appointment as a temporary copyist or as a warder in a military prison. It would be greatly to the advantage of the soldier if First and Second Class Certificates exempted their holders from further examination in the case of several minor appointments, and a list of such appointments is attached.

The requirements for First and Second Class Certificates are forwarded herewith, and a comparative statement of the state of education in the Army since 1871.

It is suggested that the possession of a First Class Certificate should be held to entitle a soldier to civil employment after 12 or 21 years' service, if his character while serving has been good.

It may be observed that under the Order in Council of the 4th June 1870, Section VII., it rests with the chiefs of departments to recommend to the Treasury cases in which examination may be wholly or partially dispensed with. Possibly, some arrangement might be made under which a certain number of the minor appointments would be reserved for discharged soldiers of good character who possessed First or Second Class Certificates.

In 1887 the Fourth Class Certificate was abolished, as it was of too elementary a nature to be of any practical utility.

N.B.—Since 1886 the examinations have been more carefully conducted, and the requirements have been higher.

PAPERS handed in by the Chairman, 13 June 1895.

EMPLOYMENT of DISCHARGED SOLDIERS and PENSIONERS on the Public Works, Building Works Department.

REPORT of Colonel Sale, Superintendent of Building Works Department, War Office.

I HAVE had occasion to employ a good many soldiers, both whilst serving in the Army and after discharge, and also in conjunction with civilian labour.

My experience is that they are well suited for many positions which do not involve the exercise of steady continuous labour, but that, as a general rule, it does not pay to employ them on building-work jobs.

For caretakers, timekeepers, watchmen, storemen, warders, and such like, they are to be preferred to civilians; but when it is a question of navvy's work, concreting, bricklaying or carpentring, then the civilian who has not been in the Army is, as a rule, to be preferred.

The difference is more particularly marked, the harder and more exacting the nature of the work. For instance, it is rare to find a man from the Army who can do a genuine day's work as an excavator; an Army man has not been habituated to such labour, and cannot do what can be done easily by a man of inferior physique who has been used to such work all his life.

Of course, there are notable exceptions to the rule; there are amongst Building Works Department employés discharged soldiers who are first-rate men, equal to civilians in all respects.

The quarterly payment of pensions is a drawback to the employment of pensioners, as they are very apt to get on the drink and absent themselves from work on such occasions. If it were possible to make the payments at short intervals, it would certainly be for the good of the men themselves.

The statement made by Mr. Randall in his reply, No. 1046, though doubtless made in good faith, is not quite correct; the point has been over and over again dealt with in correspondence with the Director of Army Contracts.

Dear Sir, Town Hall, Cardiff, 28 May 1895.

RETIRED SOLDIERS.

Dear Sir, Cardiff, 21 May 1895.

I FIND there are eight retired soldiers in the waterworks department in Cardiff, none of them now in the Army Reserve ; six of these men are employed as labourers, one as meter inspector, and one as assistant turncock. The one employed as meter inspector is of good education and ability, the rest are generally of good character and steady workmen.

Yours, &c.
(signed) J. A. B. Williams, Water Engineer.

J. L. Wheatley, Esq.

Dear Sir, Cardiff, 14 May 1895.

IN answer to your inquiry regarding the number of Army Reserve men employed in my department, I beg to state that at present there is only one. He is employed as a park-keeper, and is well qualified for the post.

I remain, &c.

Sir, Town Hall, Belfast, 29 May 1895.

In reply to your circular letter of the 30th ultimo, I have to inform you that the police force doing duty in this city is an Imperial institution, and not under the control of the Corporation.

There are 104 retired soldiers in the employment of the corporate departments, 27 of whom are in the Army Reserve, and there are also nine sailors.

Generally speaking these men are intelligent and well conducted, but in some instances not to be depended upon for steadiness, particularly when they receive their pensions.

Dear Sir, Corporation Tramways, Renfield-street, Glasgow, 10 June 1895.

In reply to your letter of 30th April last, I have now pleasure in informing you that there are in the employment of this department 114 men who have been in the Army, and four who have been in the Navy. Thirty-three of the former are now in the Army Reserve.

With regard to general qualifications, this department has only been in operation since last July, and I have not had very much time to form an opinion. However, I may say that their conduct seems to be generally satisfactory. They are principally engaged as tramway drivers and conductors. The men who have been in the Artillery make good drivers; and others, who have not been accustomed to horses, are chiefly employed as conductors.

Horace C. Dawkins, Esq., Yours, &c.

Sir, Town Clerk's Office. Sheffield, 10 June 1895.

In compliance with your letter of the 30th April last, I send you the appended list of the number of retired soldiers and sailors at present employed by the Sheffield Corporation as policemen or otherwise, showing how many of such employés are now in the Army Reserve.

The heads of the several departments employing the men report most favourably on their conduct and qualifications for the performance of their duties, with the exception of the superintendent of the cleansing department, who states that the Army pensioners under his control spend the days on which they receive their pensions, with a day or two following, in dissipation, and that for some years past he has thought it wise not to engage such pensioners.

PAPER handed in by the Chairman, June 1895.

MEMORANDUM by the Postmaster General.

SINCE 1892, when the present Regulations came into force, the Post Office has been in the habit of offering all appointments as postmen or porters, for which there are no candidates among telegraph messengers or other persons in the service of the Department, to Reservists or discharged soldiers or sailors. Whilst the limits of age for others are 18 to 30, Reservists are eligible so long as they are in the Reserve, pensioners up to 45, and time-expired men up to 32.

To facilitate the employment of such discharged soldiers the War Office has instructed the various officers commanding the regimental districts to keep lists of persons thus eligible for employment; and the postmasters throughout the country have been directed on every occasion of a vacancy for a postman or porter, for which no person already in the employment of the Department has a claim, to apply to the regimental district on a prescribed form for the nomination of a discharged soldier.

Should a telegraph messenger, after his messenger service, enlist, and return to the Post Office with a good character at the expiration of his service with the colours, he would be allowed to count half his Army service as Post Office service, so as to entitle him to a higher starting pay, as well as counting towards pension.

Thus it may be briefly said that while the Department considers that persons already in its employment have the first claim upon it, all vacancies for postmen or porters, subject to this claim, are conferred on discharged soldiers or sailors.

MR. WILLIAM WOODALL, IN THE CHAIR.

Colonel JOHN SMITH YOUNG, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

1 YOU are Secretary to the Royal Commission of the Patriotic Fund?—I am.

2. And you have held that office since when?—Since 1887.

3. Before that time you were Assistant Commissary General?—In the Army, yes.

4. And you have had large experience in the Commissariat and Transport Staff, now known as the Army Service Corps?—I served 27 years altogether in the Commissariat and Transport Staff, and this Service embraced five campaigns.

5. You have had experience in Hong Kong, Natal, Ceylon, Abyssinia, and a number of other places?—Yes.

6. We are about to invite you to assist us in the inquiry we have been commissioned to make into the history and circumstances attending the administration of the Patriotic Fund and the different charities which have been entrusted to those Commissioners for management; are you in a position to say how far you are instructed by the Commissioners 'to co-operate with this Committee in the inquiry it is making?—Yes. The Commissioners, at a meeting held on the 9th of April, passed a resolution authorising me to give evidence on their behalf, and to facilitate the inquiry in every possible way that the Committee might desire, and with that particular object in view I have prepared a statement, drawn up as concisely as the circumstances would admit, of the whole work of the Commission, framed, first, in regard to its financial and statistical aspects; next, in regard to the conditions affecting each fund and the relief afforded through it; and finally, in regard to cost of management, with a summary at the end of the views which the Commissioners have held from time to time, which are evidenced in their reports to Her Majesty, of the position that they feel they hold to the public in relation to their trusts.

7. You favoured me with a copy of the memorandum to which you refer, and I think I understand that you had printed copies also prepared for distribution among the Members of the Committee?—With your permission I will now give a copy to each Member of the Committee, and I will at the same time give a copy of the latest Report of the Commissioners to Her Majesty, which was presented to the House, I understand, yesterday, and is therefore available for the use of Members, because it brings up the information in an official form to the latest date (handing in the statement and the Report).

8. Then you have taken the trouble to obtain advanced copies for the use of the Committee of a Report which has not yet issued from the printers to Members generally?—Yes.

9. Perhaps you will put the Committee in possession, in a few sentences, of the circumstances under which the Patriotic Fund originated?—Yes. May I, before actually going to that, take this statement and refer to the first four paragraphs, with a view to helping the Committee?

10. You can refer to them, but perhaps you will answer my question?—In paragraph 5 you will find the information which I am about to give you as to the origin of the Patriotic Fund. The Patriotic Fund was a special subscription by the public, called forth by the circumstances of the war with Russia in 1854 to 1856. Almost at the outset of it the circumstances seemed to indicate that some direction was required as to the proper means of safeguarding the contributions and their application, and Her Majesty issued a Commission, dated 7th of October 1854, which will be found in extenso in the Eighth Report (commencing at page 54) of the Royal Commissioners to Her Majesty; but I have here extracted in the statement the main object with which the fund was raised, in the words of the Commission, as follows: "Succouring, educating, and relieving those who, by the loss of their husbands husbands and parents in battle, or by death on active service in the (then) present war, are unable to maintain or support themselves."

11. The Royal Commission then gave effect to a spontaneous movement?—Absolutely spontaneous.

12. Of patriotic sympathy with the men who were serving their country with so much heroism accompanied by so much distress in the Crimea?—That is so.

13. But from the date of the Royal Commission in 1854 until 1866, am I right in supposing that there was no intervention of Parliament?—There was none.

14. The fund was administered on the responsibility of the Royal Commissioners in terms of the Commission itself?—Quite so.

15. Then you will presently give us further particulars showing what followed upon that, particularly from the date of the passing of the Patriotic Act, 1866; but now I will leave you, if you please, to describe, as you propose to do, these introductory tables in the Memorandum. I imagine that it will not be convenient to discuss these tables in detail till a later stage?—That is so. It was with that object that I rather desired to refer to them; that is to say, that I should like the Committee to understand at the outset the scheme of this paper. The intention of the first paragraph is to give, with a bird's-eye view as it were, the whole of the financial condition of the trusts that are now fulfilled by the Patriotic Fund Commissioners, showing the capital amounts up to the latest date available, the 31st December 1894 (which is practically to-day), the receipts during the year 1894, and the expenditure in 1894, in payments to widows and orphans, as separated from the payments in management and distribution of relief; and I thought it might be for the convenience of the Committee that they should have that as a table to refer to on any of the other points that might be raised throughout the inquiry. The second table is a purely statistical table. It shows the "Numbers of Widows, Orphans, and others in receipt of benefits from the various Funds administered by the Commission," as they stood at the 31st of December 1894, which is the latest date up to which one could well give the information, though I would not wish it to be understood that there are not changes constantly taking place; for instance, in the Patriotic Fund there have been, to begin with, so many deaths since the commencement of the year. Then, in paragraph 3, it is shown how the recipients of these benefits are distributed between the Navy and the Army, because as you go on I have no doubt that questions will arise as to the possible interests or particulars in regard to how the different branches of the Service are found to exist in the different funds.

16. It has always been contemplated from the first origin of the fund that the monies subscribed should be available alike for soldiers, seamen, and marines?—In the Patriotic Fund raised originally the distribution was absolutely without distinction between Navy and Army, the only conditions that governed the distribution were the number of widows that were furnished by the respective branches of the Service. Everyone was relieved; it was simply the question of the widows and orphans that had to be relieved that determined the proportion given to one Service or the other.

17. And that equality between the two different services has been maintained from first to last?—Till now.

18. Then you were going to speak on the 4th paragraph?—The 4th paragraph is to show at a glance that the work of the Commission, in a word, girdles the globe wherever the British flag flies. We have annuitants in Vancouver's Island and we have got them in New Zealand, and the Table shows how the distribution is according to countries. Now I will proceed to show when Parliament first intervened in the administration of the Royal Patriotic Fund.

19. Can you give us the motive for the intervention of Parliament at that time?—Yes; the motive is disclosed in the preamble to the Patriotic Fund Act of 1866, 29 and 30 Victoria, cap. 120. Certain changes appeared to have been rendered necessary in regard to the administration of the fund in bringing it more under Parliamentary control than existed apparently under the machinery of the Royal Commission. In giving expression to this the proper machinery appears to have been considered; and in the preamble it says, "Doubts have arisen respecting the power of Her Majesty to give directions concerning the application of the fund further or other than those contained in the said Commission, and respecting other matters connected with the constitution and powers of the body of Commissioners and the conduct of the business relating to the fund, and it is expedient that all ground for such doubts be removed." Then it proceeds to enact as an Act of Parliament certain directions as to the application of the fund; but that was found apparently to be too brief altogether. There were many considerations which had to be scheduled, and the Patriotic Fund Act of 1867 was passed in the following year, which will be found in the Eighth Report to Her Majesty, at page 69, together with a new departure in regard to the relation of the Crown to the Commission, and that is that Her Majesty, by the advice of her Ministers, may issue a Supplementary Commission, and that was what was done in 1867; that Act being followed by the issue by Her Majesty of a Supplementary Commission, dated the 26th of March 1868. The words of both Act and Supplementary Commission are identical in the main features, that is, laying down the limitations for the Commissioners to observe in the application of the fund; and they are as follows (you will find them in my statement): "First, in relief of widows, and maintenance, education, training, and advancement of children of soldiers, seamen and marines of our Army and Navy who lost their lives in battle in the late war with Russia, or in consequence of wounds received in or by or in consequence of other casualties sustained in or disease contracted in that war."

That

That remained the actual limitation from that day till now of the application by the Commissioners of the Patriotic Fund, and outside of that it is not in their power to go in regard to pecuniary allowances.

20. That is to say, in the first place it limited the application of the fund to those who had suffered in the war with Russia?—And to those cases of widows who could prove by satisfactory evidence that the deaths of their husbands were due directly to service in the war with Russia; for the words are explicit that it is in or by wounds or disease contracted in that war.

21. Then, secondly, it was extended to the cases of those who suffered "in any other war?"—That, if you will notice, is limited entirely to children. That is very important to notice, and I am sure there is a great deal of public confusion on that point, and therefore I am very glad to have the opportunity of pointing out at the outset that it is limited entirely to children. The pecuniary relief that can be afforded to widows of those who served in the Russian war is entirely limited by the condition of the deaths of their husbands being proved by satisfactory evidence to have been due to service in the Russian war; "secondly, in maintenance, education, training and advancement of children of soldiers, seamen and marines of our army and navy who have lost, or should thereafter lose, their lives in battle in any other war, or in consequence of wounds received in or by or in consequence of other casualties sustained in or disease contracted in any other war," May I explain the object of that?

22. Certainly?—The object of that clause arose from the fact that at that period, 1867–8, the age limit had been attained in the case of the orphans of those who actually died in the war with Russia; that is to say that it was part of the scheme of the original application of the fund that the allowances to widows and orphans, and educational benefits of any kind whatsoever, should terminate in the case of boys at the age of 14, and in the case of girls at the age of 16. Consequently the objects for relief, if limited entirely to the Russian war, would have been absolutely exhausted with the attainment of the limits of age except in a few cases, to which you will find reference later on, of unfortunate children who were afflicted with permanent disabilities, who were provided for beyond those ages, and those who survive continue to be provided for to this day. Therefore, that second clause gave a preferential consideration to the children of those soldiers who might lose their lives in any other war. Then, "thirdly, in maintenance, education, training and advancement of children of the soldiers, seamen, and marines of our Army and Navy who had lost or should thereafter lose their lives in the service of the Crown, or by or in consequence of casualties sustained or disease contracted in the service of the Crown."

23. Not necessarily in war?—Not necessarily in war. The object of that was obvious. Everyone hopes that war will not be resorted to very often; and as this endowment through the means of the Patriotic Fund was applied partly to the permanent maintenance of the Royal Victoria Patriotic Asylum for Girls at Wandsworth Common, it was to provide that for all time there should be adequate assistance given to the daughters of soldiers who in any ordinary service lost their lives in the service of the Crown.

24. Then the next stage to which you call our attention is the passing of the Patriotic Fund Act of 1881. That was 27 years after the fund originated, and, of course, marked a considerable period in the accomplishment of the objects relating to both widows and orphans?—Certainly.

25. What was the general intention and effect of the legislation of 1881?—The Act of 1881 really marks, if I may so say, the most important epoch in the history of the Patriotic Fund Commission. Immediately on the issuing of the Act of 1867 the Commissioners were very much pressed to extend their operations in a very wide way, and certainly far wider than the original Commission; and they gave effect to an acknowledgment of that pressure by putting in a paragraph into their 8th report, which is the report that I have already referred to, as containing the Act of 1867, and the Supplementary Commission of 1868; and I should like, if it is not wearying the Committee, to read that paragraph, because it appears to be an evidence of a recurring pressure upon the Patriotic Fund Commission, and it is as true to-day as it was then.

26. What is the number of the paragraph?—Paragraph 20, page 7 of the 8th Report: "There appears to be a widely prevalent opinion that all widows and orphans of men who served in the Russian war are entitled to allowances from the Patriotic Fund, irrespective of other conditions, such as the date of marriage, service subsequent to the war, whether or not the husband was wounded or suffered serious injury whilst engaged on active service, or the date and cause of his death. And, further, an opinion appears to exist that persons who are entitled to allowances do not receive them, in consequence of a rigid and unnecessary adherence on the part of the committee to the principle that the capital must be preserved, and the interest only applied in relief. Not only are the foregoing opinions held as respects those whose husbands or fathers served in the Russian war, but, though to a less extent, a belief prevails that the widows of any other war, or even the widows of any men who may have died in the service of the Crown, have a claim on the fund. In the hope of removing these erroneous impressions we humbly request your Majesty's attention to the following extract from the original Commission defining the persons for whom the fund was intended: 'Whereas amidst the glorious successes which through the power of Almighty God have attended our arms during the present war many soldiers, sailors and marines serving in our armies and fleets have gallantly fallen in battle or by other casualties during the war; and many who shall hereafter be engaged in conflict or in the further prosecution of hostilites may also nobly sacrifice their lives in our service while protecting the invaded liberties of our ally and repressing the lawless ambition ambition of our enemies, and, whereas it has been represented to us that many of our loving subjects throughout our kingdom and dominions, actuated by a just sense of the sacred rights of those who fall in their country's service, and in support of our just cause of war, are anxiously desirous of testifying their loyalty and love to us and to our Throne by a just and generous benevolence towards the widows and orphans of those of our soldiers, sailors, and marines who have been so killed or may hereafter die amidst the ravages and casualties of war, and also by their gifts and subscriptions to contribute a portion of those means with which our nation has been blessed towards succouring, educating and relieving those who, by the loss of their husbands and parents in battle, or by death on active service in the present war, are unable to maintain or to support themselves.' "

27. I am asked to call your attention to a charge laid upon the Commissioners "to make full and diligent inquiry into the best mode of aiding the loyalty and benevolence" of the public. Have you the Commission before you?—Yes, it is set out in the 8th report; I know the paragraph to which you refer.

28. The particular point to which I am asked to call your attention is that one of the instructions was that the Commissioners were charged to see that the contributions were "applied according to the generous intentions of the donors thereof," and that the distribution should be "impartial and beneficent," and so on. Are we to understand from you that the Commissioners were discharging that duty in making careful and due inquiry as to the particular necessities of those who might become claimants upon the fund?—That is so.

29. That, in your opinion, the intention of the fund was that it should be limited to those who were unable to maintain or support themselves?—That is the contention.

30. And that widows and orphans have not merely as widows and orphans a claim upon the fund unless they stood in need of assistance from the Patriotic Fund?—Quite so; but in so saying I would like to say that the words of the Commissioners themselves were what I wanted to quote in illustration of that. It is this very paragraph; it is very long, but it must be taken in the whole to get at that fact which you have just now alluded to.

31. You desire to emphasise the concluding words of the passage you have already read?—Yes, "unable to maintain or to support themselves." The Commissioners go on to say in the 8th report:—"There can be no doubt that these passages apply only to those who became widows or orphans by the loss of their husbands or fathers in service during the Russian war, and did not contemplate those women who might after the termination of that war marry soldiers or sailors who had been engaged therein. Nor did the clauses under consideration refer in any way to the widows and orphans of men who might die subsequent to their service in the war, but limited it to the widows and orphans of those who had fallen in battle or by other casualties, 'or who might afterwards die amidst the ravages and casualties' of the then 'present war.' In order, however, that the benefits of the fund might be extended as widely as possible the powers entrusted to the Commissioners have been interpreted liberally. Relief has been granted to widows and orphans not only of men who were married at the time of the war, and whose deaths did not occur until long after it had ceased, but also in some cases to the widows and orphans of men who did not marry until after the war had ended; and for several years the only condition requisite to establish a claim for an allowance was that the death of a husband or father was connected with his previous service in the war. On the 18th of March 1865, however, after the lapse of nine years, and after much consideration, the Committee deemed it necessary to establish a regulation as to the date of marriage; and a rule was made that no widow should be recognised as a widow of the war unless married prior to the 1st of January 1858. This regulation was approved of by the former Commissioners, as reported in their 6th report to your Majesty. But even now, though 13 years have elapsed since the termination of the Russian war, allowances are given to the widows and orphans of men whose deaths can be traced to their services in that war if not excluded by the above rule as to the date of marriage. And, further, assistance is given in the education of, and in providing outfits for, orphans of men who served in that war, but who are by the existing rules excluded from the ordinary allowances. The Commissioners think it their duty to explain that, on the receipt of an application for assistance, every inquiry is made of medical officers and others, including the medical departments of both army and navy to elicit the facts of the case. And with the view of ascertaining how far the death of the soldier or sailor has been connected with his service in the Russian war, all the papers, accompanied by a summary, are examined by three members of the committee at their own homes (one of those members being the present Director-General of the medical department of the navy), and their opinions severally recorded on the papers before the applications are considered by the executive committee. The committee therefore confidently assert not only that no just claim is refused, but that every consideration is shown to applicants, and frequently information obtained to help them in establishing their claims."

32. I think you remarked before proceeding to give us that quotation that the views stated therein are as true to-day as they were at the time they were written?—Exactly so.

33. But you were about to tell us something about the intervention of Parliament in 1881?—Yes. I felt it was necessary to show you those views because they have undoubtedly been mitigated by what perhaps might be considered, looking at it by the light of what occured in 1879 and 1880, the exercise of too much generosity in the application of the fund. It may not perhaps be inappropriate at this stage to call the attention of the Committee to a parliamentary paper which contains correspondence between the War Office and

and the Royal Commissioners of the Patriotic Fund relating to the condition of the fund, which was presented to both Houses of Parliament by command of Her Majesty in July 1881. It is Parliamentary Paper [C. 2956].

34. You are speaking of correspondence between the War Office and the Commissioners which preceded the legislation of 1881?—Yes, and which, in fact, accounts for the reasons why the Patriotic Fund Act of 1881 was originated. But before referring to that I would say that that inquiry was the result of allegations then made against the Patriotic Fund Commission, that they had not sufficient assets to meet the liabilities which they had incurred; and I am sure I am facilitating the inquiry by saying that it was fully admitted in regard to one particular, namely, the establishment of a school for boys; and the Commissioners as the result of this inquiry were enabled by Parliament, as you will see in the Act of 1881, to sell the boys' school. But the Government of the day, after considering all the circumstances of the case, summed up their view of the position resulting from that too generous application of the Patriotic Fund, and the steps that should be taken in regard to the work and constitution of the Patriotic Fund Commission for the future; and on page 15 of the Correspondence that I have just alluded to, you will find this paragraph: "The question of the administration of the various funds vested in the Commissioners, and the proposal made in the letter from this office of 17th March, that any surplus of the Patriotic Fund remaining after the closing of the school" (that is the boys' school I have just alluded to) "should form the nucleus for providing in some more permanent way for the widows and children of sailors, soldiers, and marines killed in action, dying of wounds, or drowned on service, was then discussed. The deputation pointed out that the Commissioners were charged with the legal custody of several funds raised for particular objects besides the original funds, and Mr. Childers and Lord Northbrook" (Mr. Childers at the time was Secretary of State for War and Lord Northbrook was First Lord of the Admiralty) "agreed that this created a great difficulty in carrying out the suggestion that the work of the Commission might now be finally wound up. It was arranged that a Bill should be introduced into Parliament to enable the Commissioners to transfer the now disposable surplus of the original funds after disposing of the boys' school and any surplus funds remaining after the conclusion of their existing trusts to a general fund to be administered by them in conjunction with the Military and Naval Departments which should be devoted to the assistance of widows and children of soldiers, sailors, and marines killed in action, died of wounds, or drowned on service, Mr. Childers and Lord Northbrook undertaking to recommend to the Treasury that the funds should be supplemented by certain funds at their disposal for kindred objects, and, with the consent of the Treasury, to ask Parliament to appropriate such funds from time to time in aid of public subscriptions as might be necessary to secure an adequate provision for such cases as the Commissioners, after investigation, might deem deserving of assistance. It was further considered desirable that permanent officials of the War Office, Admiralty and Treasury should be added to the Commission, for its general business and especially for the administration of funds available in this manner. The question whether the payment of the pensions to which the Commissioners are now liable should be handed over to the Military and Naval Departments, was reserved for further consideration. On learning from you that the Commissioners concurred generally in these conclusions, instructions will be given to the Parliamentary draftsman to draft a Bill to provide, (1) for the abolition of the boys' school, with power to dispose of the site and buildings; (2) for the appointment of a small governing body for the girls' school who shall be responsible to the Committee of Council for Education or the Charity Commissioners; (3) for the future constitution of the Commission; (4) to enable the Commissioners after setting apart a sum for the education of Roman Catholic girls, reduced proportionately to the original amount appropriated for the education of Roman Catholic children of both sexes, to appropriate the surplus of all their trusts, where not otherwise directed by the terms of the trust deed, to form a nucleus for a general fund to be administered by them in conjunction with the Naval and Military Departments and to be devoted to the assistance of widows and children of soldiers, sailors, and marines killed in action, dying of wounds, or drowned on service." The Patriotic Fund Act of 1881 is almost literally a repetition of the words I have used; it provided for the sale of the boys' school, and provided for a scheme for the Royal Victoria Patriotic Asylum for girls, which, in passing, I will say was cancelled by the Patriotic Fund Act of 1886, because the circumstances financially were altered entirely by the sale of the boys' school; the Commissioners, instead of being in a position of not meeting their liabilities, began to see their way to restore liabilities which they felt were due to certain classes, which I will refer to afterwards, of recipients under the original Commission; and the administration of a large institution like the Patriotic Asylum for girls, the only one almost existing, it may be said, for such a number, at any rate, is of the greatest benefit in connection with what I may call a poor fund, that is, a fund which is not subscribed by the public to such an extent as to give allowances such as the Commissioners have been accustomed to give in the Patriotic Fund and the better subscribed funds.

35. Before we leave Lord Morley's letter, he appears, in the long paragraph that you have quoted, to have contemplated the possibility that Parliament might be asked from time to time to appropriate sums in aid of public subscriptions?—Yes.

36. Was anything done in that way?—No.

37. He further contemplated that the fund should be supplemented by certain funds at the disposal of the War Office and the Admiralty for kindred objects that was done in the application of the Soldiers' Effects Fund?—That is so, as far as regards the army.

38. Could you tell us when those funds were made over to the Patriotic Fund?—The Soldiers' Effects Fund (as you will find on referring to page 13, paragraph 21 of the Statement) was handed over in 1884, but with retrospective effect to 1882; the object being to provide for the widows and orphans of the Egyptian Campaign, which had then just come to a close.

39. But you have told the Committee that in regard to the recommendations upon which the Admiralty and the War Office were agreed, the Act, as finally passed by Parliament, provided for the abolition of the boys' school?—Yes.

40. That it provided for a scheme for the management of the girls' school independently of the Patriotic Fund?—Quite so; it would have been placed under the Charity Commissioners.

41. But that that was rescinded by the subsequent Act of 1886?—Yes.

42. Then the other recommendations were practically given effect to by legislation?—Yes, and the most important, because it is really the declaration of policy laid down by the Government of the day for observance by the Commissioners, and what I refer to here is: "Parliament again intervened by the passing of the Patriotic Fund Act of 1881 giving effect to the policy of the legislature as to the application of any ultimate surpluses of the Patriotic Fund and other funds under the administration of the Commission."

43. It was contemplated at that time that the obligations towards those who had suffered during the Crimean War would have been satisfied?—Quite so.

44. Now we come to the intervention of Parliament once again in 1886, and the Patriotic Fund Commissioners by that time were recognised, I suppose, as a permanent body?—Quite so. May I say that the constitution was added to in accordance with the scheme of Mr. Childers and Lord Northbrook by the addition, ex officio as members of the Commission, of the Accountant General of the Navy and the Accountant General of the Army.

45. By the way, the nominated Commissioners, whose names are given in each of the Reports presented to Parliament, are headed by the President, His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge; can you inform the Committee on whose responsibility the other members were nominated from time to time?—Entirely on that of the advisers of Her Majesty. The course is generally in this way: that in regard to naval members the First Lord of the Admiralty gives such names as he thinks would add to the efficiency of the administration by the Commission, to the Secretary of State for War, and the Secretary of State for War submits these to Her Majesty and they are gazetted; and for the Army of course it is the Secretary of State for War for himself.

46. But you are calling attention to the addition of certain ex officio members as a new feature dating from when?—From the Act of 1881; entirely new.

47. You are speaking more particularly of the Accountants General at the War Office and at the Admiralty?—And the Secretary to the Treasury. As an effect of the passing of this Act the present Lord Welby, who was then Mr. Welby, the Secretary to the Treasury was added, and Sir Ralph Thompson, Permanent Under-Secretary of State for War, was added; and, latterly (it was in 1893), Sir Evan Macgregor, the Permanent Secretary of the Navy, was added.

48. And Sir Ralph Thompson and Sir Evan Macgregor were added by name individually, but really in recognition of their official position?—Yes, to carry out this paragraph of Lord Morley's letter which I read: "It was further considered desirable that permanent officials of the War Office, Admiralty, and Treasury should be added to the Commission."

49. But there is a distinction between the Permanent Under-Secretary at the War Office and the Accountant General, one being added by name and the other ex officio?—That is so. I cannot explain it, but it is so.

50. Now, shall we go a step forward to 1886. A new duty was then added to those that had previously been confided to the Commissioners?—It was felt that complete effect could not be given to a policy which indicated that Parliament could only be called upon for the help that is referred to in Lord Morley's letter, which I have just read, without power being given, which did not exist before, to the Commissioners to ask for and receive from the public subscriptions, and thus gauge the extent to which voluntary aid might provide for the casualties by war or specific disaster; and consequently the Patriotic Fund Act of 1886 was passed, which amongst other things authorised the Commissioners of the Patriotic Fund, and placed upon them the responsibility "from time to time to ask for and receive contributions from the public for such purposes, being for the benefit of the widows and children of officers and men of Her Majesty's Naval and Military Forces."

51. In illustration of that Instruction may I ask you to inform the Committee what time elapsed between the publication of the news of the disaster to the "Victoria" and the appeal by His Royal Highness to the Lord Mayor to open a fund; am I right in saying that that appeal was made on the afternoon of the same day, on the morning of which we received the news of the disaster?—Exactly so. On the 15th page of my Statement that fact is recorded, exactly as it occurred, in these words: "During the forenoon of Friday, the 23rd of June 1893, the news of the disaster which had, on the previous day befallen H.M.S. 'Victoria' off the coast of Syria, whereby the Naval Commander-in-Chief in the Mediterranean, Vice-Admiral Sir George Tryon, and 361 officers, seamen, and marines of Her Majesty's Navy, were drowned, first reached the public in the metropolis. In the evening of the same day, His Royal Highness, the President of the Commission, acting in fulfilment of the responsibility laid upon the Commission, and under the powers granted to it by the Patriotic Fund Act, 1886, viz.:—from time to time to ask and receive contributions tributions from the public for such purposes, being for the benefit of the widows and children of officers and men of Her Majesty's Naval and Military Forces,' addressed to the Lord Mayor of the City of London an appeal to open a fund, with the object of caring for the widows, orphans, and other relatives who had by the disaster been suddenly deprived of husbands, fathers, and sons, their stay and support."

52. Now to revert to the history of the Patriotic Fund: You are now in a position to tell us what is the particular classification of benefits which the Patriotic Fund affords, and which it has, I understand, invariably afforded throughout its history?—As I have pointed out, pecuniary allowances are limited entirely "to widows of those who died in, or by, service in the war with Russia, 1854–6." The capital amount remaining for this purpose, as you will see if you turn to the Table on the first page, is 342,910*l.* 17*s.* 2*d.*

53. That was the position at which the capital account stood at the close of 1894?—Yes.

54. Will you state to the Committee what was the amount originally subscribed to the Patriotic Fund in round figures?—Subscriptions, of course, ceased somewhere about 1860, but special donations were attracted afterwards, and a summary of subcriptions was given in the Eighth Report. I can give it from memory. It amounted to about 1,467,000*l.*, the subscriptions by the public.

55. I see that during the year 1868 the fund was augmented by a sum, which made the total amount, by the end of that year, 1,460,000*l.* odd; let us call it a million and a-half?—Yes, a million and a-half.

56. That million and a-half had shrunk by the expenditure of the fund till, at the end of 1894, it came to less than 343,000*l.*?—Yes.

57. Then you call our attention to the fact, as I understand you, that naturally the funds available for the personal assistance of the widows survivng, their purpose having been served, were practically spent; but the funds for the maintenance and education of the children you endeavoured to keep intact?—Intact. As a matter of fact, they perhaps slightly increased. But I should like, if the Committee will allow me, to just tell briefly what has been the amount that has been conveyed in relief in regard to the objects of the original Patriotic Fund; and the figures are these: Up to the end of 1879 1,375,462*l.* 17*s.* 7*d.* was paid out. From 1880 to 1894 inclusive there was 379,736*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.*, making together 1,755,199*l.* 14*s.* 3*d.* in pecuniary relief. Then in education and maintenance of children, which is the second category of relief, there was spent 46,000*l.* in purchase of nominations to Wellington College and these other schools, temporary schools at Barnet and Wandsworth (those were for children before the institutions were built at Wandsworth), 71,254*l.* 4*s.* 10*d.* For the Royal Victoria Patriotic Asylum for Boys there was spent 32,682*l.* 1*s.* 2*d.* in construction, but in 1882 it was sold for 32,000*l.*, so that practically that was wiped out, and the net balance of construction for the boys' school remains at 682*l.* 1*s.* 2*d.*; maintenance of boys up to the end of 1879 was 51,402*l.* 16*s.* 5*d.*, and from 1880 to 1882 8,316*l.* 18*s.* 6*d.*, making together 59,719*l.* 14*s.* 11*d.* in maintenance and education of boys. The school was then closed and sold. For the girls' school, which exists at the present time, in construction up to the end of 1879, there was spent 71,818*l.* 7*s.* 7*d.*, and from 1880 to 1894 inclusive, 6,070*l.* 0*s.* 11*d.*, making a total for construction of 77,888*l.* 8*s.* 6*d.*; for maintenance up to 1879, 165,205*l.* 13*s.* 1*d.* was paid out; and from 1880 to 1894 inclusive 88,131*l.* 7*s.* 1*d.*, making a total for maintenance of 253,337*l.* 0*s.* 2*d.* That made, for the second category, altogether 508,881*l.* 9*s.* 7*d.* I have left out, however, two items. By the Act of 1881 the Roman Catholic Orphans' (Patriotic) Fund was founded, and from 1882 up to 1894 inclusive there has been spent on that Roman Catholic Orphans' (Patriotic) Fund 20,691*l.* 3*s.* 10*d.* And, further, on behalf of orphans of officers, in education there has been spent 8,286*l.* 11*s.* 2*d.*, making a total expenditure for the objects of the Patriotic Fund, and from the Patriotic Fund alone (it does not include special funds), 2,293,058*l.* 18*s.* 10*d.*

58. That represents what?—That represents the total relief that has been paid out for the benefit of widows in pecuniary allowances, orphans in pecuniary allowances; also in maintenance and education of orphans from the Patriotic Fund from 1854 to 1894, a period of 40 years.

59. That is the gross expenditure; the grand total of your expenditure for relief in different forms?—Yes.

Sir Herbert Maxwell.

60. That includes the buildings?—Yes; I have separated the items for buildings.

Chairman.

61. Now, then, let us come to consider what was the general scale of rates of pecuniary allowances made to widows, and how far have they been modified, if at all, by subsequent practice?—In paragraph 9 of my statement I say: "The rates of pecuniary allowances to widows, as originally granted, and those at present in force, are as follows: Officers, widows of colonels (with corresponding ranks in the Royal Navy), 66*l.* per annum; widows of lieutenant-colonels, 53*l.* per annum; widows of majors, 46*l.* per annum; widows of captains, 37*l.* per annum; widows of lieutenants, 30*l.* per annum; widows of ensigns, 27*l.* per annum."

62. Now, may I ask you if in fixing those amounts the Commissioners took into consideration any pensions to which those officers might be entitled from Government funds?—That was so; they were fixed after very careful consideration of the compassionate allowances and pensions that the officers' families received from Government. "These allowances" (as my Note A, shows) "are in addition to the naval or military pensions enjoyed; but there are cases of widows who were not eligible to receive naval or military pensions, and to these special rates were awarded" in each case. I have not inserted them here, because they were so varying.

Chairman—continued.

They were masters of transports, civilians and others lost in the foundering of the vessels in the Black Sea during the war; grades in the Navy which had not then been rated as they are now, assistant engineers; and were not entitled to pensions and such like; and they had relatively larger allowances than those I have quoted, from a recognition of the fact that they had no other means of subsistence.

63. Was it the practice of the Commissioners to increase the allowance as old age gains upon the recipient?—It was. I may, in passing, say that there has been no change in those rates I have given up to the present time, with one little exception, and that is in regard to the advanced age allowance as we call it technically; that is to say, that when a widow attained the age of 65, she was granted an addition, if her circumstances required it; for there has always been an observance of what is regarded as the initial administrative principle of the Commission that they must be in need of assistance. If they were in need of it they got an addition of one quarter, 25 per cent.; and that has now been extended (there are very very few remaining) to those that are 60 years of age, instead of at 65 as originally.

64. Now, if we come to the case of the orphans of officers, the allowances made to them cease at what age?—Eighteen years of age for boys, and 21 for girls.

65. But in exceptional cases of permanent infirmity what has been the practice?—They were continued in the allowance that they had ordinarily; that is to say, that for the orphan of an officer ranking as a post-captain in the Navy or colonel in the Army it would have been 16*l.* a year, and that was continued to them for life. There are only six cases now remaining on the books of the fund. Without giving them in detail the original allowances were two at 12*l.* per annum, but they are now just doubled, namely, two at 24*l.*, because, as a matter of fact, they are well up in life, 40 years of age. One at 13*l.*, that is now 20*l.*; two at 16*l.* are doubled and made 32*l.*, and one that had 25*l.* is made 35*l.*; that is an epileptic male who has a slight allowance from the Government, and that is why he is a little different from the others.

66. I think you told us that in regard to the allowances made to officers it has not been felt necessary to make any change in the scale from that laid down originally to the present time?—That is so.

67. But that is not true with regard to non-commissioned officers and soldiers, and petty officers and sailors?—No.

68. Will you tell us what has been done with regard to the grades of non-commissioned officers and soldiers in the Army and their equivalent in the Navy?—Those allowances that I have just now referred to will be found as an Appendix to the Second Report, page 18. In regard to allowances for widows and children below the rank of officers, I have only put in in my statement one original rate, but in fact there were several rates, while the Commissioners were doubtful as to the extent of the fund, but they were in force for such a limited period that I would submit that they are hardly worth considering, because it was in May, 1856, that these final allowances were granted which I have put into my paper, which used to be 5*s.* a week for the widow of a drummer and trumpeter or private; 5*s.* 6*d.* a week for the widow of a corporal or bombardier; 6*s.* a week for the widow of a sergeant; 6*s.* 6*d.* a for the widow of a colour-sergeant, and 7*s.* a week for the widow of a staff non-commissioned officer.

Chairman—continued.

69. Varying these under ordinary circumtances as originally fixed from 5*s.* a week to 7*s.* a week?—Yes.

70.—And those allowances were increased at 60 years of age, were they not?—By 2*s.* a week all round.

71. At what period was the scale augmented?—The scale was augmented first in 1893.

72. An honourable Member calls attention to the fact that in dealing with officers, you suppose that they look for nothing less than an annual salary, whereas those of a lower rank are treated by weekly payment?—They were originally paid monthly, but it was found convenient, as their circumstances altered so very much more rapidly than those of officers, to make the scale a weekly scale rather than an annual scale, and the payments to officers were always made half-yearly. It was rather the following out the system of our own Army pensions than anything else.

Sir Herbert Maxwell.

73. But that is a daily amount?—Yes, for soldiers, but the scales for officers' widows are annual.

Mr. Kearley.

74. The dependent relatives and widows are paid quarterly now in advance, are they not?—Yes, they have been since 1882.

Chairman.

75. By what amount did the Commissioners find themselves able to augment the weekly allowance?—The augmentation took the form of carrying out a distinct policy, that was of helping those who were no longer able to work; for the original principle upon which allowances were granted was distinctly the recognition that those who were able to do something for themselves should do something for themselves; they were never calculated on the idea that they maintained a widow entirely; and I should like to put in just now for the information of the Committee the actual rules for the allowances of widows as they were in 1856, which, I believe (I cannot say it absolutely), were drawn up by Lord St. Leonards, the Lord Chancellor, then the Chairman, and which enunciate the principles concretely that I have just referred to. It says here: "If when capable of service she remains idle and will not go to service or assist to maintain herself she will be struck off the books of the fund; it is not intended that widows shall live in idleness on the fund." That gives utterance better than I can to the view with which the Commissioners from the very first dealt with the question. These instructions were issued in 1855, or 1856 at the very latest, to all the officers who paid the allowances; for in those days the staff officers of pensioners paid the allowances; the whole machinery of the the military system was at our disposal in those days.

76. I think I understood you at an earlier stage to say that that was the fundamental principle to which the Commissioners have steadily adhered all through their subsequent history?—Yes; until the widows got aged and were no longer able to do anything for their own maintenance.

77. You do not regard that as any deviation from the principle?—No; on the contrary, it is a recognition of the original principle, because we recognise an age at which they are no longer able to maintain and support themselves, and, therefore, we increase their allowances considerably in their old age.

78. I will not trouble you to explain further what has been done with regard to the orphans of non-commissioned and petty officers, soldiers, and sailors who were afflicted with permanent infirmity, but they were treated on the same principle as you have already described in the case of officers?—As a matter of fact, they took advance of the officers, and were first dealt with, and it was following the lines of the non-commissioned officers that the officers' cases were dealt with afterwards, doubling the allowance where we could double it.

79. Now we come to another branch, so to speak, of the work of the Commission, as to the course which they took in providing for the maintenance and education of orphans, the funds you have spoken of as in the second category?—Yes, that is giving effect to those two clauses which gave an extension of the benefits of maintenance and education to orphans of other wars besides those of the Russian War; in fact, to any cases of orphans of men who died by their service.

80. You called our attention to the fact that the Endowment Fund of the Royal Victoria Patriotic Asylum stood at the end of last year at 157,766*l.*; it would be, perhaps, convenient if you were to explain to us now the policy of the Commissioners in regard to the establishment of those two schools; in the first place, they provided for the erection endowment maintenance, and so on, of a large school for boys and a separate one for girls?—Yes, the original intention was limited to girls; it was from the very outset one of the forms which the Commissioners felt would be an appropriate way of commemorating the immensity of the Patriotic Fund subscription by affording a permanent memorial, to use their own words, of the national generosity, and it was limited entirely to the Asylum for Girls. I alluded a little while ago to the fact that possibly from pressure put upon them the Commissioners launched out into expenditure after 1867, which brought them under the ban of public censure in 1879 and 1880, and it was generally admitted that the extension of the application of the fund to the erection of a boys' school was the cause of that; and consequently the boys' school was put an end to.

81. Then may we take it that a school for boys was built and established, and the idea being afterwards abandoned the premises were disposed of, and the money gained by the sale of it was added to the general capital account?—It actually formed the foundation of the Roman Catholic Orphans Fund.

Chairman—continued.

82. The Royal Patriotic Asylum was intended, as we are told, for children of all creeds; but it was found impossible to provide in the same institution for those holding the Roman Catholic faith?—Yes.

83. At what time, then, was it found expedient to set apart, I suppose, a certain pro rata sum for the maintenance exclusively of the Roman Catholic children?—Well, it was originally intended that the Royal Victoria Patriotic Asylum should provide for all creeds, but you will find in and from the second report correspondence which shows that circumstances arose which rendered it desirable to provide in some way or another for those of the Roman Catholic faith separately. Although the Roman Catholic Orphans Fund was not started till 1882 as a separate fund, provision was made for Roman Catholic orphans outside of the Royal Victoria Patriotic Asylum in consequence of what I have referred to. Contentions were raised of various descriptions against their maintenance in the Royal Victoria Patriotic Asylum, and they were provided for out of the Patriotic Fund in Roman Catholic orphanages throughout the country, and that system obtains to this day. In regard to the Royal Catholic Orphans Fund it is entirely a liquid fund so to speak—not appropriated to the endowment of any institution, but the income of it is applied to payments for orphans in institutions dotted throughout the United Kingdom.

84. But for the convenience of account in 1882 the pro rata amount to them in regard to their numbers was separately allocated?—Separately allocated as the result of a sub-committee that went into the matter in relation to the number that the Roman Catholics bore in the services to the total amount of the services.

85. And the equity of that arrangement has been generally accepted, I imagine?—Generally accepted.

86. In your memorandum you call attention to certain capital sums that were paid out of the General Patriotic Fund to secure nominations in perpetuity in certain institutions?—Yes.

87. Those sums amounting in all to 43,000*l.*?—Yes.

88. Is there anything you would like to tell us about the Royal Victoria Patriotic Asylum?—You were asking me a little while ago as to how the Victoria Patriotic Asylum originated, and I will answer the question in the words of the report; it is on the first page of the 2nd Report.

89. By the way, was it at all times the practice of the Commissioners to publish an annual report?—No; there was a period apparently when they allowed some years to elapse without a report; latterly there has been one every year.

90. Of recent years the report has been annual?—I can answer for it that from 1881 it has been so. Owing to that inquiry that I referred to, in 1879–1880, you will find that the 19th report embraces perhaps two or three years.

Mr. Kearley.

91. You present your Annual Report now by Order of Parliament, do you not?—I would not like to say that. We present our report to Her Majesty, and the Secretary of State takes Her Majesty's commands, as I understand it, and presents them to both Houses of Parliament. We do not.

Chairman.

92. I find that the first and second reports were presented in 1857 and 1858-9, the third in 1863, the fourth in 1864, the fifth in 1865, and then there appears to have been two reports as to which there is no record of their having been presented to Parliament; the eighth report comes in 1870. Now, you are quoting from the second report, which is not necessarily the report of the second year?—No; the second report is dated 1858, and the Commission was founded on the 7th October 1854. The passage I wish to quote is this:—"We also considered it in accordance with our instructions from your Majesty to make a further provision for the objects of our care in such a manner as would confer permanent benefit on the two services. We therefore decided to establish and endow an institution for the education of 300 daughters of soldiers, sailors, and marines. Your Majesty was graciously pleased to mark your approbation of this arrangement by laying the first stone of the Royal Victoria Patriotic Asylum." This was the origin of the Royal Victoria Patriotic Asylum, and the Commissioners appropriated securities to furnish an endowment fund of 140,000*l.*, which it was estimated would be sufficient to maintain 300 girls.

93. But perhaps you will just explain some of the principles upon which the school for girls has been conducted with regard to the recognition of the different faiths of the children who are placed under disadvantages. I suppose children of all creeds are eligible; they are instructed in the tenets of the Established Church?—They are, but that is not because there is any exclusion of any other faith; we have done our best in regard to other branches of religion, but we cannot manufacture girls belonging to these others; and though we have given distinct encouragement to one particular body, the Wesleyans, and drew up special regulations for their religious instruction, and I was in communication with a clergyman who represents the interests of the Navy and Army, on the Wesleyan organisation we have not been able to get one in.

94. You have not had any practical difficulty, then, on that score?—None whatever.

95. And no necessity for anything like a Conscience Clause?—We have the Conscience Clause of course in connection with the school, because the school as a school is under the Elementary Education Act, and therefore we must observe the Conscience Clause.

96. I was just coming to that point; is it inspected then by the officers of the Education Department?—It is.

97. And the reports of those inspectors are incorporated in the reports of the Commissioners for the Patriotic Fund?—In our reports regularly they are put in every year in extenso in the body of the report, the actual words of the Education Department's Inspector.

Chairman—continued.

98. Then they earn the grants of the department?—They earn the grants.

99. Which go in aid of the expenses?—They go in aid of the expenses of the institution.

100. Then when you quote the average cost at 19*l.* 14*s.* 8*d.*, exclusive of charges for maintenance of buildings, that is probable for clothing and food and maintenance generally?—It is for maintenance of every description. In the report, copies of which I have handed round to honourable members, which was presented to Parliament yesterday, the headings of the account will show the items; it is on page 51 of the 33rd report. The expenditure, as you will see, is made up of provisions, water (that is, the water rates that we pay to the company), fuel, light, laundry, stores, etc., in fact, it is everything except what you will find in the separate account for building and land maintenance.

101. But in addition to your general income from investments you derive some assistance from the Greenwich Hospital Fund?—Yes.

102. And such grants as it can earn from the Education Department?—Yes, the grants from the Greenwich Hospital Fund are in payment at the rate of 20*l.* per annum, for girls nominated by the Admiralty.

103. Am I right in saying that in no other respect have you any control over the funds from Greenwich Hospital?—We have none whatever.

104. Is there anything else you would like to say with regard to the Royal Victoria Patriotic Asylum before we have that?—Nothing, except to say this, that if the Committee would like to visit the institution, or make a surprise visit, I am sure the Commissioners would welcome it; they have nothing to fear; they believe that it is conducted with the greatest success. The girls are educated up to the sixth standard of education, and are then trained specially for domestic service, and placed out in domestic service if the mothers consent.

105. Now then, perhaps you will be able to tell us, is there any system of oversight or record as to the career of the girls after they have left the asylum?—Yes, we affiliate every girl that is placed out in service to the Girls' Friendly Society, of which the associate for the purposes of our girls is one of the ladies who is a member of the committee of management of the Royal Victoria Patriotic Asylum, Lady Montague Pollock; and we follow girls while they are in service, and we also retain a hold over those that render satisfactory service by a system of rewards for retention of their first situation; that is to say, we give them 2*l.* reward if they keep their first situation two years; if they remain in it four years, we give them another 2*l.*; and if they remain in it six years, we give them another 2*l.*

106. I do not want to trouble you for details, but are you able to assure the Committee that the careers generally of the girls when they leave the asylum is so satisfactory that they reflect credit on the management of the institution?—Certainly. I feel I am quite within the mark mark in claiming for the institution that it has rendered immense service in regard to the girls that have been trained in it.

107. Are you aware that there has ever been any adverse criticism upon that particular point?—Certainly. The Reports of the Commissioners of former years undoubtedly contained records of circumstances which no one regretted more than the Commissioners themselves, resulting from the personal inefficiency of those who were entrusted with the management of the institution; or, perhaps, it may be held from some points of view in the system of management, but I can only say that from the time that I have been personally connected with it the record, I think, has been of a character to distinctly sustain its credit as a first-rate institution. I am not wishing to claim it as anything connected with myself personally; it was due to those who managed it; before I came it had taken a good turn.

108. Are you able to tell us anything of a similar nature with reference to the Roman Catholic orphans who were confided by you to institutions under private management?—Of course, the assistance that we afford to those of the Roman Catholic faith is of an entirely different character. We pay for their maintenance in these different orphanages. These different orphanages have been visited from time to time by members of the Committee. The one at Norwood is continually visited by a member of the Committee, because it is close at hand; but the St. Clare's Orphanage, though it is very distant, namely, in Dublin, has been the recipient of our girls for quite 30 years, and the results obtained in the girls being placed out are very satisfactory. You will notice that it has been our endeavour, and it is distinctly an advantage, to get orphanages in different parts of the country.

109. One is at Norwood, and one at Torquay?—And one in Scotland.

Mr. Cochrane.

110. Where is there one in Scotland?—Girvan; St. Joseph's Convent, Girvan.

Chairman.

111. The income from the fund allocated for this purpose is adequate, is it?—Of course it would be bad financial management to exceed the income; but we could do with a very much larger amount.

112. As a matter of fact, are there Roman Catholic orphan applicants who are entitled to assistance, whom you have to neglect?—Not to neglect, but we cannot take them in immediately. We have always a large waiting list.

113. And is that true also of Protestant children?—Yes; but, of course, in their case we deplete the list much more frequently owing to our having 300 girls in the institution in the one case, and in the other case the numbers amount to 71.

114. Now, we may approach, I suppose, the consideration of the different funds that have been entrusted to the administration of the Patriotic Fund Commissioners which are external to the original fund proper. First of all there is the small sum which now amounts to 591*l.* 11*s.* 2*d.*, which was a bequest from two brothers, was it not, the Thurlow Fund?—A gift; I believe they are both alive still.

Chairman—continued.

115. That represents a gift in 1884 of 500*l.* from Major Edward H. Thurlow and Captain Ernest H. Thurlow?—Yes.

116. That sum was intended to supplement, I suppose, grants in aid of the instruction of girls?—Yes. I have the actual letter of the brothers Thurlow if I may read it?

117. If it is not too long?—No, it is a very short one. It was purely a gift, almost without any conditions at all I may say: "In reply to your letter of the 2nd inst. stating that the recommendation of the Committee of the Royal Victoria Patriotic Asylum is that our donation of 500*l.* should be preserved as an Endowment Fund, we beg to state that we quite approve of the money being applied for that purpose, and that the interest should be used from time to time for the benefit of deserving girls, beyond what the present regulations admit of." That condition has been very difficult to carry out, for the simple reason that the financial condition of the asylum has been so good of late years that it has quite sufficed for all the ordinary wants of the girls.

118. Are you not rather qualifying the statement you made just now, that the funds were not quite sufficient to enable you to meet the cases of all the applicants whom you desired to assist?—That was as to the Roman Catholic Orphanage Fund. In answer to your question whether any were neglected I said no, but that we could not take them in immediately.

119. I suppose this fund was intended as a sort of outfit for girls?—It has been interpreted as applying to cases which we not very frequently, but sometimes, have of girls who develop ill-health while they are in the institution, and who cannot go into service, and we assist them by donations.

120. But as a matter of fact there has been so little use made of the fund that that which stood in 1884 at 500*l.*, ten years later is 591*l.*?—That is so.

121. Then we may pass that. Now we come to the Rodriquez Fund, money that came under the will of Don Francisco Rodriquez, who died in April 1857, and left his property to be applied to the relief of "families of English subjects wounded or dying in the wars"; that is so, I think?—Yes.

122. And the Commissioners at the request of the Government undertook the administration of it?—That is so.

123. Will you tell the Committee what was the first instalment paid over in the year 1864?—In 1864: 1,766*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*, but from the very outset there appears to have been difficulties as to the application of the bequest, and you will see that it was not till 1866 that the remainder of the bequest was received, partly owing to these difficulties; and the whole was invested in the purchase of 7,380*l.* 16*s.* 4*d.* consols.

124. It stands at nearly double that amount by this time, I see?—It does. There is one provision in the will which has been a standing difficulty in its application. It is a strict injunction.

Chairman—continued.

It is a long document; it will be found printed in the 4th Report, page 19. Owing to the strict injunction in the will that "no one shall profit but such as are really indigent and necessitous," the application of the fund has been very much limited, with the result that the Fund has gone on increasing, and now amounts to 14,771*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* The Commissioners held that no one could profit by it who had any pension or allowance of any kind from the Government.

Mr. Kearley.

125. That was the definition by the Patriotic Fund Commissioners?—That was the definition by the Patriotic Fund Commissioners.

Chairman.

126. Going much beyond the interpretation of the necessity laid down by the Commissioners themselves?—You mean in regard to the Patriotic Fund? Yes; it is undoubtedly so; they themselves admitted it in the passage that I referred to in the 4th Report.

127. According to the legislation of 1867 and the Supplementary Commission that arose out of it in the following year, authority was given for a new interpretation of the objects to which the fund might be applied?—Yes, in the words of the Act, which were "for the like purposes as the Patriotic Fund." That enabled the fund to be applied more widely than previously in the education and advancement of children; but even with this extension of application, the limitation by the testator of his bequest to "such as are really indigent and necessitous" only, has continued to cause the capital of the fund to increase yearly still.

128. Then it was not till 1881 that the fund was practically absorbed and placed under the same conditions as apply to the Patriotic Fund generally?—Or rather directed to be absorbed, because it is part of a scheme for the application of the surpluses of all funds administered by the Commission; that is the feature of the Act of 1881, to which I alluded.

129. Perhaps you will explain to the Committee what has been the general financial treatment of this fund; they are taken in separate accounts, although they are available for one common purpose?—"A like purpose." That has been interpreted, not that it should be applied to increasing the allowances of the Patriotic Fund Widows, but for like purposes to those which were defined in the Act, partly for the maintenance and education of children.

130. Then, for example, the Rodriquez Fund is in practice applied in what way that is not met by the Patriotic Fund?—Well, those are eligible for the Rodriquez Fund whose husbands died from other war services than the Russian War Service.

131. Will you explain how it has happened that this continual addition to the income has taken place so that it has doubled up to the present time the sum standing in the name of the Rodriquez Fund; how it has happened that that has gone on so accumulating, while at the same time the Commissioners have felt that the money available for Roman Catholic Orphans was not sufficient; Don Francisco Rodriquez was presumably a Catholic?—The first limitation placed by Don Rodriquez is that they should have died in war; we have hardly any on the Roman Catholic list who would come under that condition. Our last war was the 1885 war of Egypt.

Mr. Kearley.

132. May I ask where the will of Don Francisco Rodriquez is?—You will find it at Appendix D, of the Fourth Report.

Chairman.

133. There is no limitation in the will of the Fund to the purposes of assisting children of any particular creed?—None; and the question of religion never turns up.

134. Then will you please tell the Committee what was the course taken in 1881, under the Patriotic Fund Act of that year, in regard to this particular Fund?—The effect of that is briefly to hold it up for the fulfilment of the policy of the Government that was expressed in the Act of 1881, and amalgamating this fund with the surpluses, whenever it was thought fit and right to do so, of the special funds and the Patriotic Fund proper.

135. Then during the year 1894, what were the grants made from that Fund?—The grants varied from 10*l.* to 30*l.*, and in my table, at Paragraph 2, I show that the recipients of those were one widow, two other dependents, and five orphans for educational allowances.

136. Have you got the total amounts?—Yes; the amount expended was 156*l.* 5*s.* 6*d.* in 1894.

137. And those took the form of donations, not annual allowances?—Exactly.

138. Were the gratuities given to adults or to children?—In the majority of cases it was as I show in the tables, No. 2, to five orphans.

Mr. Kearley.

139. Educational allowances? — Educational allowances; that is in fact in fulfilment of the extension of the Fund which was sanctioned by the Patriotic Fund Act of 1867, which allowed it to be applied for like purposes as the Patriotic Fund.

140. Then the Patriotic Commission do regard it that in the case of this particular fund they have some right to go beyond the will of Don Francisco Rodriquez?—Subject to the limitations that are expressed here.

141. But you do regard it that you have the right to go beyond the expressions of the will, subject to certain limitations?—And subject to the cardinal one that they must be indigent and necessitous.

142. And this particular payment of the education allowance of five children took place outside the provisions of the will?—I would not say actually outside, but rather that they were taking a more liberal interpretation than could be placed upon them in the first instance, but not outside.

Chairman.

143. Are you able to say that there have been no cases really of indigent and necessitous persons brought under the notice of the Commissioners in

in aid of whom this money might have been applied?—I am quite able to say that; we should be only too delighted if we could get cases; but cases do not come to us.

144. The double qualification that they should be relatives "of English subjects wounded or dying in the wars," and that they should be "really indigent and necessitous" is attended with insuperable difficulty?—That has been the direct result of these limitations.

145. But I take it now that you look forward, under these broader conditions which Parliament has sanctioned, to being able to make that fund more useful in the future?—With the other funds.

146. By treating them as unexpended funds which may be amalgamated?—For the general purposes of widows, orphans, and other relatives of sailors, soldiers, and marines.

Mr. Brodrick.

147. Could you furnish us with a list of applications rejected by the Commissioners; to my knowledge there are scores of necessitous and indigent cases which have had to be refused by the War Office, and for which this money was available, but has not been applied; and I should like a list of rejected cases over a moderate period of years; would the records enable us to have the cases from 1871?—It would involve a very great deal of labour.

148. A Return was furnished to Parliament of all the widows and orphans of officers and soldiers who had been refused relief by the Commissioners of the Patriotic Fund since the 10th of August, 1866, with the reasons; that was furnished in 1871; now, my question is this: would the records of the Commission enable you to furnish us with a list continuing that Return from 1871 up to the present day?—Certainly; there could be no difficulty in furnishing that, except the difficulty of a limited staff. Perhaps you can give me the number of the Return to which you have referred.

149. No. 107?—The Commissioners gave that Return, but they were obliged to say at the time that it almost crippled the office, and we have a more limited office than we had then; it is a great labour to go back a number of years and furnish Returns of that kind. I admit it can be perfectly well done, but it is a question simply of labour.

Mr. Kearley.

150. May I remind you that that Return was made at a month's notice?—They had a much larger staff then than I have now.

Chairman.

151. An honourable Member wishes to know whether there has been any interpretation of "English subjects," as specified in this fund; do they include men serving in the Native Indian Army?—I could not very well, I think, without looking to the detail of the cases which have received relief, say whether those of the Indian Army are excluded; but I can say that a widow who has an allowance just now got it on account of the death of her husband by service in the Afghan war.

Mr. Seale-Hayne.

152. I want to know whether the term "English subjects" is interpreted as meaning English by nationality or merely subjects which would include all the forces of the Crown in the Indian Army and the Maltese force, and various other forces of that kind; I want to know whether the widow of any soldier wounded or dying in war in those services has been admitted to it or not?—I cannot say without referring to records whether they have or have not, but I am perfectly certain I can affirm that they would not be excluded. Certainly any of those you mention would not, because they are English subjects; whoever are subjects of the Crown, whatever nationality they may be, would be included.

153. You told us just now, as a reason why that there has been so little application of this fund, that there have been no applicants for relief under it?—That is so.

154. I presume it is hardly known in the services generally that there is this fund applicable for relief?—That is undoubtedly one of the difficulties that the Patriotic Fund Commission labours under, that its benefits are not known in these smaller funds perhaps so well as one would desire.

Chairman.

155. Now the case of the Zervudachi Fund, named after Sir Constantine Zervudachi, K.C.M.G., a Greek merchant of Alexandria, and who in 1883 presented to the Crown a donation of 1,300*l.*; was there any limitation or definition of the purposes for which that fund was to be applied?—No, there was absolutely no condition of any kind attached to it. It was a personal gift from Sir Constantine to his Royal Highness the Duke, but it did not even specify anything further than that it should be intended as a recognition of the benefits which he felt he had received from the English in Egypt; but there were no conditions of any kind at all attached to it.

156. The first intention of the Commissioners was to apply that fund how?—For the benefit of the widows and orphans of those who lost their lives in Egypt.

157. But in the following year another fund was available for that purpose; what has been done with the Zervudachi Fund?—In the following year the "Soldiers' Effect" Fund was transferred to us, and that more than sufficed for the needs of those who fell in Egypt or any of the other wars that have occurred since, or active operations, such as those in Burmah; and the Zervudachi Fund had by a process of bookkeeping got into the Patriotic Fund proper, and it was taken out of that and made a separate account; and the Commissioners at the time were considering what they should do in relation to the surpluses of the various funds as referred to in the Schedule to the Act of 1881; and as that could not be adequately dealt with at the moment, because they were following out a policy of increasing the benefits of the recipients in their old age who were on the special fund, they directed that the Zervudachi Fund should be carried to a separate account and form ultimately a part of the General Fund to be formed by the surpluses of these various special funds, and that if in the meantime any case should come up of any widow applying for assistance whose husband lost his life in a war in connection with which no special fund had been raised by the public, such a widow might be placed upon the fund.

158. But are we to understand that at the time of which we are now speaking such a widow would go without relief were it not for this fund?—That is practically as it happens; our own records show hardly a war but what there has been some fund. As a matter of fact, we have got one widow of the Abyssinian Expedition, in respect of which no war fund was raised, and she has been put on it.

159. Have you anything further you would like to say to the Committee with reference to that fund?—No. I explain these circumstances to account for why it was that it is left to accumulate. It was the result of a distinct conforming, as the Commissioners felt it to be, with the policy laid upon them by the Act of 1881.

160. The amount of the donation which in 1883 was 1,300*l.* has now increased till it stands at 1,783*l.*?—That is so.

161. But the Commissioners have laid down a scale of allowances from the fund for such cases as seem to come under it?—Quite so; it was necessary to do that to enable any case to be entertained by the Executive Committee, because, of course, the scheme of organisation of the Patriotic Fund Commission is that the Executive Committee deals with all the applications for relief in accordance with the Orders and Regulations of the Commissioners.

Mr. Kearley.

162. Do we understand that out of this fund not a penny either of principal or of interest has been spent?—That is so.

Chairman.

163. Now we will proceed to the "Captain" Fund; H.M.S. "Captain" was lost in 1870?—Yes, the night of the 6th September 1870. It was on the occasion of the loss of the ship in the Bay of Biscay, in connection with which a committee of naval officers formed at Portsmouth raised the fund at a public meeting on the 13th September, 1870; but it was not till April, 1871, that any action was taken so far as bringing the Patriotic Fund Commissioners into relation with the "Captain" Fund was concerned.

164. The Committee had previously made the disbursements on their own responsibility?—They had made their disbursements on their own responsibility, and they dealt with one class of claimants definitively before the transfer of the balance of the fund to the Patriotic Fund Commissioners; that was the cases of the officers' families.

165. They made permanent provision for the families of the officers?—Yes.

166. And then they handed the surplus over?—Handed the balance to the Patriotic Fund Commissioners in two sums: "34,000*l.* to secure permanent allowances to "widows and children of petty and non-commissioned officers, seamen, and marines, under the same rules and on the same scale as in force for the Patriotic Fund, and 5,000*l.* in relief, calculated for short periods, of relatives other than widows and children of petty and non-commissioned officers, seamen, and marines."

Chairman—continued.

167. Now, was that fund augmented by any contributions from the Admiralty?—Yes, the Admiralty, in accordance with its then practice, handed over the gratuities which were awarded, generally speaking, of 12 months' pay; I believe, in the "Captain" Fund case, the whole was 12 months, because the whole were lost except very few people; but their practice is to give sometimes three months, sometimes four, up to a maximum of 12 months' pay of the men lost.

168. But has it been the practice of the Admiralty to hand over for administration by the Patriotic Fund Commissioners the gratuities awarded?—That was done in the "Captain" Fund. and accounted for in our Report presented with Appendices.

169. My question was, was it the ordinary practice?—It was not so in the "Victoria" Fund.

170. The Admiralty reserved the distribution of their own fund to their own officers?—In regard to these gratuities which I was referring to here, you could hardly call it distribution. They make the payment in a lump sum; they do not distribute it.

171. But they make it direct rather than through other Commissioners?—They do, but the practice was, in this "Captain" Fund, with and by the advice of a Naval Committee, to deal it out so far as it would go under the same rules and on the same scale as in force for the Patriotic Fund.

172. The sum in 1871 was 39,000*l.*, which was handed over to the Commissioners; it now stands at 32,064*l.*?—Yes.

173. Is there anything else you wish to say on this fund?—The application of any ultimate surplus after providing for the specific trusts under the deed will be governed by the policy indicated by the Legislature in Section 4 of the Patriotic Fund Act, 1881.

174. The provisions common to all surpluses?—Yes.

175. You have, in fact, already told us that the claims of widows and orphans of officers had been dealt with before the funds were handed over to the Patriotic Commissioners?—Yes.

176. With regard to other widows; what was the general scheme of treatment for them?—The Committee which arranged the details of the transfer of the balance of the fund to the Patriotic Fund Commissioners accepted absolutely the scale of allowances and the rules in force of the Patriotic Fund widows; and you will observe that the allowances "Ordinary" and "After 60 years of age" have followed exactly the scale that I have in the previous paragraphs shown were given for the Patriotic Fund, and similarly the fund being in a very good financial condition they followed the Patriotic Fund widows in the increases which I have alluded to which were given to the Patriotic Fund widows.

Chairman—continued.

177. At the present time varying, under ordinary circumstances, from 6*s.* to 8*s.* a week?—That is so.

178. Augmented, after 60 years of age, to from 8*s.* to 10*s.*; after 70 years of age, to from 9*s.* to 11*s.* per week?—That is so.

179. Do any children now remain on the fund?—None.

180. Of course the "Captain" was lost in 1870, and dating 16 years from that as the extreme limit for girls, and as the boys went off at 14, that made them cease altogether in 1886?—Yes.

181. Now we come to the "Eurydice" Fund; will you state when the "Eurydice" was lost?—It was lost on the 24th March 1878, off the Isle of Wight.

182. Two lives only being saved?—Yes. A squall came on and she went down.

183. A committee was formed on the 27th of March following, and certain resolutions were adopted at a meeting held on the 10th of April at Portsmouth?—Yes.

184. One of the resolutions requesting the Patriotic Fund Commissioners to undertake the administration of the fund?—Yes.

185. What was the date of the deed of trust?—The 19th of November 1878.

186. By that deed of trust what amount was transferred?—A specific sum of 19,000*l.* was transferred to the Commissioners to secure the payment of allowances to the widows and orphans of officers, petty officers, seamen and marines, and of the Royal Engineers specified in the schedule of the deed, "on the same principle as the scheme adopted by the 'Captain' Relief Fund." As a matter of fact, they actually followed in the steps of the "Captain" Fund Committee, and that accounts for, as you will notice, how very early the date they applied to us was. The ship was lost on the 24th of March, and the meeting was held on the 10th of April, at which the resolutions were passed asking us to undertake the administration of the fund.

187. But on the "Captain" Fund there was no occasion to provide for the families?—No, they departed from that; they adopted the Patriotic Fund scale for the officers as well as for the non-commissioned officers in the "Eurydice" fund. By that time I think I may say it was found that the principle of paying lump sums to widows and orphans did not really secure the results that were hoped. They had a habit of disappearing, and relief was applied for again.

188. May we take it that the general treatment of widows and children of officers and men followed the table of the Patriotic Fund?—Exactly so. You will find that these allowances are exactly the same as the Patriotic Fund for officers, as well as those below the rank of officers.

189. The "Captain" grants were made to relatives other than widows and orphans?—Calculated for short periods; that was following the same principle also as the "Captain" Fund; certain sums were allocated by the Committee to certain relatives to be issued in allowances till the sum was run out; but it was specially laid down what they were to receive.

Chairman—continued.

190. In the case of the fund for the "Eurydice," as is in regard to those entitled to relief from the "Captain" fund, the children are now past the limits of age?—Yes.

191. Now, reverting for a moment to the "Captain" Fund, will you explain to the Committee the movement out of which grew the general fund which became known as the Royal Naval Relief Fund?—There was a provision in the deed of trust of the "Captain" Fund that any ultimate surplus after meeting the specific trusts under the deed shall be applied "in relief of widows, children, or parents of officers, non-commissioned officers, sailors, and marines of Her Majesty's Navy"; and the managing committee of the "Captain" Fund voiced a feeling that has continued up to the present time, certainly in naval circles, for the formation of some general fund for the benefit of the widows, orphans, and dependent relatives of sailors and marines, for whom no public fund would be ordinarily subscribed by the public; because there are many deaths due to accident in the ordinary service of the Navy which do not attract public sympathy or public philanthropy; and a long correspondence ensued on the subject of the creation of such a fund between the Admiralty, the Secretary of State for War, and the Royal Commissioners, which will be found in the 12th Report of the Commissioners to Her Majesty at pages 13 and 14; and ultimately in 1872 the Commissioners were furnished, by a Commission from Her Majesty the Queen, dated the 7th of June 1875, with the requisite powers to receive contributions, and to form them into a fund to be called the Royal Naval Relief Fund. It was admitted from the very outset, as you will observe by the 13th Report, page 11, that such a fund would necessarily be exceedingly small at the first outset, but it was thought that it would attract accretions in every year, and it was therefore agreed upon with the Secretary of State for War and the Naval Committee which advocated the establishment of the fund, that no distribution should be made until such amount had accumulated as in the opinion of the Commissioners would enable the fund to be satisfactorily administered for purposes of general relief, that is to say, for cases not specially provided for by public subscriptions or from other sources; and it was decided, in any case, that relief should be afforded in the following order: first, orphans; second, widows with children; third, widows without children; fourth, aged parents of unmarried men.

192. Are you able to tell the Committee what sums from the "Captain" Fund went to form this new Trust?—There was none from the "Captain" Fund, though the "Captain" Fund Committee originated the idea, and obtained for the Patriotic Fund Commissioners the powers which enabled such a fund to be created. They did nothing, and could not very well do anything, with reference to the "Captain" Fund, because in their deed they had already put in a clause to provide that it should be applied to these objects whenever their surplus could be applied to these objects.

193. But, as a matter of fact, are we to understand stand that for three years the Royal Naval Relief Fund has been formed under a Royal Commission without having any money in its coffers?—There was no corpus of the fund existing until the "Eurydice" Relief Fund Committee gave practical expression to their concurrence in the views of the "Captain" Fund by absolutely appropriating 3,150*l.* of the fund that was subscribed by the public for the relief of the sufferers by the loss of the "Eurydice" to form, or rather to bring about the formation in a monetary sense, of the Royal Naval Relief Fund.

194. Then, are we to understand that, after having handed over to the Commissioners the 19,000*l.* previously referred to, the "Eurydice" Committee retained a certain balance in their own hand?—That is so, and handed it over for the purposes of the Royal Naval Relief Fund, and I may say that a sum of 19,000*l.* was specifically handed over, because already they had a scale of allowances in force for the Patriotic Fund and the "Captain" Fund, and it was a question of actuarial calculation what amount would be needed to be handed over to the Commission to secure these permanent allowances; and that 19,000*l.* is the outcome of the actuarial examination into the ages of the widows, and the number of orphans and their ages, who have been left by the men lost in the "Eurydice," and, therefore, they treated the surplus there and then, instead of waiting as the "Captain" Fund Committee did in their case until some later period, and they appropriated 3,150*l.* at once.

195. And then a further sum in the following year was added to that?—That was practically, I understand, the balance of their fund after they had paid over the 19,000*l.*, and liquidated their charges in connection with the carrying on of the Committee before the fund was transferred to the Patriotic Fund Commissioners between the month of March 1878 and November 1878, when the deed of trust was entered into with the Commission.

196. A residue of 31*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.*?—Yes.

197. And with the handing over of that residue the "Eurydice" Committee were disbanded?—Yes, they ceased.

198. I want you to explain to us with regard to the "Thunderer" Fund; tell us what happened as to that?—An explosion took place on board Her Majesty's ship "Thunderer" in 1879, and a small subscription was raised which the Committee agreed with the Royal Commissioners need not be kept apart as a separate fund, but that it could be administered as part of the Royal Naval Relief Fund, with a proviso that all the widows, children, and other relations should be placed immediately upon the Royal Naval Relief Fund for relief; that was the first start of the Royal Naval Relief Fund, for the pecuniary allowances to carry out the objects for which it was created.

199. But, I suppose, the Royal Naval Relief Fund has been from the first administered by the Patriotic Fund Commissioners?—By no one else.

200. The "Thunderer" was unfortunate in being the scene of more than one explosion of this kind?—It was.

Chairman—continued.

201. But you are confining yourself now to the particular fund which was raised in consequence of the accident on the 2nd January 1879?—That is so.

202. And that fund was subscribed and was handed over to and administered by the Commissioners?—Yes, as part of the Royal Naval Relief Fund; therefore it bears no title such as other funds, such as the "Captain" and the "Eurydice" funds; it did not bear the title of the "Thunderer" Relief Fund.

203. Now I want you to bring under the notice of the Committee the circumstances under which the fund, with a title which it takes some trouble to distinguish carefully, namely, the Royal Naval Fund, originated; how did the Royal Naval Fund originate?—The Royal Naval Fund is a fund created the year before last out of the surplus of the Royal Naval Exhibition.

204. Have you any record of the amount of that surplus?—Their accounts, which were published this year, give the amount of that fund; the assets to the 31st December 1894 amounted to 47,658*l.* according to their published accounts.

205. Was there any desire on the part of those who were responsible for the management of the Royal Naval Exhibition that their fund should be kept distinct, separately administered?—Well, of course, I can only deal with the actual facts, and that is, that they did create it as a separate fund, and that it undoubtedly overlaps the Royal Naval Relief Fund, because the objects are identical.

206. We shall have to consider by-and-by the effect of overlapping generally, and of such precautions as the Commissioners have felt it necessary to take to guard against that evil; but here are two funds hardly distinguishable in title, having identical objects, both of them administered, I am to understand, by the Patriotic Fund Commissioners?—Not the Royal Naval; the Royal Naval is administered separately by a body of which His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales is President.

Mr. Kearley.

207. Outside the Patriotic Commissioners?—Absolutely; it does not even touch them.

Chairman.

208. Is there no correspondence, no relationship, no comparison of information tendered to each board, one with the other?—There can hardly be, for the simple reason that for a general fund their work is governed by applicants, and if the applicants come to one it does not at all follow that they know anything about whether the applicant goes to the other.

209. But, as a matter of fact, any of us who have had anything to do with administration of charitable funds knows that the ingenious applicant is not at all debarred from making a second application by the fact of his having made a first?—That is the obvious result of two or three funds for the same object being maintained as separate organisations.

210. Then, for the purposes of our inquiry for the

the present moment, we must leave aside the Royal Naval Fund; but have you anything further to tell us with regard to what has been found in the administration of the Royal Naval Relief Fund?—Nothing, except to amplify what I stated, that it is part of the policy of those who organised it, and which was agreed to by the authorities who issued the Commission under which the Royal Naval Relief Fund was formed, and the Commissioners, that the funds were to go on accumulating because of the inadequacy of the amounts that were available until the sum should be reached which, in the opinion of the Commissioners, would allow of a scheme for general relief; and there was an important departure, as you noticed some way back in that letter from Lord Morley to the Commissioners of 1881, that the resources of the Commissioners for the purposes of general relief should be supplemented; and a correspondence took place between the Commissioners and the Admiralty, which you will find in the 21st Report to Her Majesty, paragraph 26, with a view to supplementing the Royal Naval Relief Fund; but unfortunately it did not meet with success. From time to time the Commissioners have endeavoured to see what they could do to apply the fund, even in a very limited way, and they found that they are overlapped on the one side by the Royal Naval Fund and on the other side by the institution in connection with the Greenwich Hospital Fund, of allowances for those very cases for which the Royal Naval Relief Fund was started; but they were not satisfied with that. They wrote to the Admiralty to ascertain if there were any cases in which it was possible relief could be afforded; but the particulars furnished showed that to have placed anybody on the fund while it remained so small would practically have been to have simply opened the door to a favoured few; for the cases that have arisen from 1884 were no less than 324 widows and 495 children.

211. Those are general?—Not altogether; three were special cases, such as the "Wasp," the "Serpent," and the "Victoria"; the other cases amounted to 165 widows and 271 children.

212. You laid down a scheme for allowances?—Yes.

213. But before making those allowances you were waiting for an accumulation of funds?—Yes; it was necessary for the "Thunderer" case, which were put on as part of the arrangement with the "Thunderer" Relief Committee of 1879.

214. Is there any objection to putting in the correspondence to which you have referred?—None whatever; I think it is very valuable information.

Mr. Kearley.

215. It deals with the "Wasp," I think?—It does.

216. A ship for which there was no fund raised at all?—Yes; here is one of the paragraphs; I asked if there was any means of identifying the cases of widows of other funds refused assistance since 1883. I mean that that is something on the same lines as what another honourable Member has asked me for. And they say to me, in answer to that, in December 1893, "It is found that there are no means in the office of identifying the cases of those widows or other dependent relatives who have been refused since 1883." so I am rather glad to be able to put the letter in, because we have done our very best. It has been a matter of the very greatest anxiety to get cases of widows and orphans on to these funds; but there was the difficulty of getting adequate funds for a general scheme in the first instance, and then adequate information of other cases which were not relieved from other sources.

Colonel John Smith Young, re-called; and further Examined.

Chairman.

217. On the last occasion that we had the opportunity of hearing your evidence you gave us a general retrospect of the history of the policy pursued in the administration of the Patriotic Fund proper. You told us also under what circumstances the Royal Victoria Patriotic Asylum for Girls had been established and the school for boys abandoned. You gave us also the history of the separate allocation of a fund to be appropriated for the care of Roman Catholic orphans; and then you told us the history of the "Rodriquez" Fund, the "Zervudachi" Fund, the "Captain" Fund, the "Eurydice" Fund, and the "Royal Naval Relief Fund," with some reference to the parallel operations which had established the Royal Naval Fund, which is administered quite independently of the Patriotic Fund Commissioners. I now proceed to ask you to tell us the circumstances arising out of a subscription, or of several subscriptions, which were prompted by the operations of the war in Zululand. There were three such funds, were there not?—There were three separate funds opened, one at the Mansion House, called the "Zulu War Fund," and two by a committee of military, naval and militia officers, namely, the "Isandlwana and Rorke's Drift Fund," and the "Zulu War General Fund."

218. The Commissioners of the Patriotic Fund were requested to take up the administration of those funds; were the funds handed to the Commissioners separately, or were they amalgamated before being entrusted to your care?—They were handed in separately, but amalgamated under the conditions of the Royal Warrant, which simply specified that the administration and distribution shall be made "in such manner as shall be consistent with the terms of the public advertisements severally announcing the opening of the funds, and subject thereto as We (Her Majesty the Queen) may from time to time be pleased to direct, and subject thereto as our said Commissioners think fit."

Chairman—continued.

219. Will you tell the Committee the total amount of the fund which was handed over to the Commissioners?—The total amount received by the Commissioners of the Patriotic Fund up to the 31st December 1880, when the fund may be said to have been complete, was 27,360*l.* [illegible] 2*d.*

220. Perhaps it might be convenient if you would tell us at what figure the fund stands at the end of 1894?—At the end of 1894, as will be seen by Table 1 of the statement, the fund stands at 25,404*l.* 2*s.* 8*d.*; and supplementing this in the same way as I did in regard to the Patriotic Fund, as to the amount that has been expended in relief, I may say that from its inception up to the end of 1894, the total sum so expended was 15,726*l.* 13*s.*

221. You have expended the large amount just quoted, while the capital account has only been reduced by something like 2,000*l.*?—Yes, that has been mainly, if I may say so in passing, owing to this fact: that it is an important feature of the administration of separate funds under one body that the funds can be saved by the admission of orphans into our educational institutions, that is to say, that the girls between the ages of seven and 11 years of age, whose mothers gave their consent to their admission to the Royal Victoria Patriotic Asylum, were so admitted.

222. Is the Committee to understand that the orphans of those who lost their lives in the Zulu War are cared for in the Asylum, and that the expense of their maintenance there, is not charged against the Zulu War Fund?—That is the case. In connection with the Zulu War Fund, there were 28 such orphans maintained in orphanages at the expense of the Patriotic Fund. That is one of the causes why the capital sum that was originally subscribed has been so little diminished.

223. And

223. And you are enabled to pursue that particular administrative policy under the authority of a Supplementary Commission of 1868?—That is so; under the second paragraph of Clause 5 of the Patriotic Fund Act of 1867, which is enunciated again in the Commission.

224. Now will you tell the Committee what were the numbers placed on the Zulu War Fund originally?—They were 10 widows of officers, 23 children of officers, 98 widows of non-commissioned officers, privates, &c.; and 138 children of non-commissioned officers, privates, &c.

225. The Commissioners, following actuarial advice as to the several amounts which the fund was justified in giving, adopted a particular scale; will you give us that scale?—That scale was as follows: For widows of officers, irrespective of rank (in that there was a complete departure from any fund that had previously been under the administration of the Patriotic Fund which gave ascending allowances according to rank; but this was so insufficiently subscribed that it was thought better to make it irrespective of rank), 30*l.* per annum, and 7*l.* per annum for each child; and the allowances for the children at first were only issuable both to girls and boys up to the age of 18, for the same reason that the actuary said that the fund would not bear it longer; but that has been recently increased to the age of 21 for girls. Then the allowances for widows of non-commissioned officers and privates were all at one rate, following the same principle, 3*s.* 6*d.* a week only, and 1*s.* a week for each child.

226. Now, up to what age would those children receive their 1*s.* a week?—Up to the age of 15 for boys and for girls. In the Zulu War Fund again, there was thus a slight departure from the ordinary age of 14 for boys and 16 for girls.

227. At what age are children received into the Patriotic Asylum?—Ordinarily between the ages of seven and 11, but sometimes we get grievous cases of double orphans who have nobody in the world to care for them, and we generally make an exception in these cases, and take them in even up as late as 14 years of age.

228. Would children receive their weekly allowance after they were admitted into the Patriotic Asylum?—No; it ceases then, because that is a contribution to the mother for the support of the children.

229. Then we are to understand that the 1*s.* a week was allowed to the children who either were not taken into the Patriotic Asylum, or up to the time when they are taken into it?—That is so.

230. Now has any alteration been made subsequently to the date you gave us in regard to the scale of allowances?—Yes, two alterations have taken place in the scale of allowances for those below the rank of officer; but the scale of allowances for officers' families remains exactly the same, with the alteration, however, which I have intimated just now, that the age to which daughters are allowed to receive it is extend d to 21 years of age from 18, but the increases in the allowances to widows and children of men below the rank of officer came in 1892 to what were then the same rates as the Patriotic Fund rates, 5*s.* per week for the widow of a private; 5*s.* 6*d.* for the widow of a corporal; 6*s.* for the widow of a sergeant; 6*s.* 6*d.* for the widow of a colour-sergeant, and 7*s.* for the widow of a sergeant-major; 2*s.* per week (instead of 1*s.* per week as originally) was granted for each child the orphan of a private or corporal, and 2*s.* 6d. per week (instead of 1*s.* per week as originally) for each child of a man above that rank.

231. What happened in the event of a widow re-marrying?—Owing to the sum being so small the allowances were calculated on the basis that the widow, on re-marrying, should lose entirely her allowance and any claim to restoration to allowance; and she was given in consequence a donation of 5*l.* upon re-marriage.

232. Then did you reconsider that policy at a later date. Let me put the question in this way: In the event of a woman who had been re-married becoming a widow a second time, did she, according to the original arrangement, find her allowance restored?—No, not until 1893 was that liability undertaken, because if the Committee will look for an instant at the figures which I quoted just now of the number of widows, that is, 98 originally, and at the figures given in Table 2, they will find that they diminished to 25 by re-marriage or death.

233. After 1893, provided the widows were then in necessitous circumstances, they had restored to them the full amount which they had been originally awarded?—They may be so restored.

234. You did not undertake to restore them?—We did not undertake that; in fact, there is a practical difficulty in tracing the women. The fund has been in existence since 1880, that is to say, 14 years, and these re-married women, having no half-allowances which retain them on the books of the fund, they disappear.

235. But I am assuming, of course, that they made application?—Quite so.

236. Providing they, having re-married, having again become widows made a fresh application to you, and satisfied the Commissioners that they were in necessitous circumstances, you then restored to them the original allowances without any abatement?—That is so; more than the original allowance, the increased allowance that has been granted since. If you will notice, the allowances are almost double; in some cases, for instance, that is the serjeant-majors' widows, they are actually double; they were 3*s.* 6*d.* all round for all ranks originally; and now the serjeant-major's widow gets 7*s.* a week.

237. Can you give the Committee the date in 1893 when the allowance was restored to the widows?—From the 1st of July 1892. It is on page 8 of the 31st Report.

238. My question so far related only to the question of the re-admission of widows after re-marriage to the benefits which were originally withheld from them on their marriage?—That decision was taken in 1893.

Mr. Kearley.

239. At what date?—I rather think it was in July 1893; but I am not quite certain from the wording of this, and I would not like to speak from memory.

Chairman.

240. You have already told the Committee that from the 1st July 1893 the allowance to daughters of officers was extended from the age of 18 to the age of 21?—Yes.

241. And probably the other concession was about the same time?—It was.

242. Now, in 1892, additional allowances in cases of sickness were authorised?—Yes.

243. To what extent have those been appreciated?—Not to any very great extent have they been issued.

244. Now, I suppose that claimants under the Zulu War Fund are beginning to fall off?—Yes. The numbers of widows of non-commissioned officers and privates, as I pointed out just now, have fallen from 98 to 25, but under the decision of the Commissioners, that re-married women, becoming widows again and being in necessitous circumstances, might apply, there would be put on very possibly, ultimately, 40 or 50 additional. It is a very heavy liability.

Mr. Kearley.

245. That is the assumed liability; you have no evidence that it will be that?—I rather wished to indicate that just now, when I said that they disappeared, there being nothing in the nature of keeping them on the books of the fund by half allowances. In those cases it works automatically. If a woman's second husband dies, we call for a report of the circumstances, and if they are such as to warrant her being placed on the full allowance, she is placed on it by our initiative, not her own. But in the case of a fund like the Zulu War Fund, they disappear. It would not be right for me to lead the Committee to suppose that the same practice obtains.

Mr. Mowbray.

246. Do you know how many of these 98 have actually died without being re-married?—Three have died. We have records of 54 re-marrying.

Mr. Kearley.

247. A record of what date?—Up to the latest date. I have had a table run out for my information for the very question of the liability that would be involved in the restoration of these, the names and ages that they would be at the 31st of December 1894 of those that we know have re-married, and the rates and allowances to which they would be restored.

248. Assuming them to apply?—That is so.

Chairman.

249. With regard to re-marriage, have you, in your experience, any difficulty arising from a disposition to conceal a re-marriage where the knowledge of the fact involves forfeiture of an allowance?—It is unfortunately continually the experience, and that has been the cause, as you may see from the reports, from the origin of the Patriotic Fund, of women being struck off the books. They were struck off the books in considerable numbers in the early part of the history of the fund for concealing re-marriage.

Chairman—continued.

250. Has it been found, in the opinion of the Commissioners, that the penalty attaching to marriage has the effect of inducing women sometimes to live in concubinage?—Well, it is rather difficult now, I think, for them to live in that state without its coming to the knowledge of someone who is interested in such matters locally.

251. I should like you to tell the Committee what are the means that you take in the way of visitation of the recipients of your several bounties?—We do not consider it necessary to carry out anything in the shape of visitation; we trust entirely to the declarations required from each recipient, and rendered quarterly by the recipients to our office, which have to be attested before certain persons who have to possess certain qualifications. These qualifications are very similar to those that are demanded from naval and military officers' widows, and pensioners who draw allowances from naval or military funds, such as a magistrate, a clergyman, a medical gentleman, a naval or military officer, an inspector of police, or a postmaster.

252. People having the opportunities of forming accurate judgment from local observation?—Yes; and if we notice a habit to migrate unduly we take such steps as we think necessary for the protection of the fund; which steps are always undertaken with the premisses that the woman is not to be made the object of any espionage, nor are the inquiries to be conducted in any way so as to reflect upon the woman, but simply to protect the fund from any irregularity.

253. Then you think that by the methods you have pursued the fund is, generally speaking, protected against any abuse of the kind that you have been referring to?—I should say from my experience of the last few years that the best proof of that is that when a woman dies (and we have, of course, a very great many of them now attaining great ages, and they die more rapidly than they did at first), her circumstances are almost always attested to, I should think in very nearly 99 cases out of 100, as being entirely respectable and creditable to her past life.

254. You have told the Committee that in the prudent administration of this particular fund entrusted to you, you increased the allowances to widows and children of those below the rank of officers in 1883 and again in 1892?—Yes.

255. And you have told the Committee the figures that now prevail; what was the amount of the allowance made in 1883, do you know. The original allowance to widows of non-commissioned officers and privates was 3*s.* 6*d.*?—The answer to your question will be found on page 8 of the 31st Report, which gives the increases which were given before 1883.

256. Can you tell us what they were?—Yes. The widows of privates remained at 3*s.* 6*d.*, as they were originally; the corporal's widow had risen to 4*s.*; the sergeant's widow had risen to 4*s.* 6*d.*; and the colour sergeant's widow and sergeant-major's widow were bracketed at 5*s.* The allowances to the orphans had increased from 1*s.* a week to 1*s.* 6*d.* a week for those of private private and corporal, and to 2*s.* a week for those above that rank.

257. Then you say that you look forward to a time when the allowances to widows will be increased on their attaining a certain age?—That is as certain as anything can possibly be, if the assets of the fund remain in the present state of surplus over the liabilities.

258. If the funds permit, you will apply the policy which has been found to work very well in the past with the other funds, and with the Patriotic Fund proper?—The policy of the Commissioners in all the funds which I would characterise as what we call poor funds originally, that is to say when they could not give allowances at the same rates as those which were thought right and proper to give in the Patriotic Fund, the "Captain" and "Eurydice," has been as the assets have been saved or as investments have enabled surpluses to grow, to increase the allowances up to the same rates as for the Patriotic Fund; and it is the intention of the Commissioners to pursue that, because it places all in the same position, because they all suffered the same loss.

259. And the age which was formerly 65, has, in pursuance of that liberal policy, been now generally made 60?—That is only in regard to officers; for those below the rank of officers 60 was always the age at which an extra allowance was given.

260. Sixty is the age for which you look forward to augment the allowances here?—Yes.

261. Then when the time comes when you have satisfied all those who may be supposed to be regarded as the direct claimants on this fund, how do you propose to apply the surplus then remaining?—The application of any ultimate surplus after providing for the specific trusts under the Royal Warrant of 22nd August 1879, will be governed by the policy indicated by the Legislature in Section 4 of the Patriotic Fund Act of 1881, the Zulu War Fund being one of those actually scheduled in that Act.

Mr. Thomas Bailey.

262. How many of those 54 who were re-married had the extra grant that it was decided to give them in 1893?—I cannot quite answer that off the book, but it is perfectly infinitesimal; I do not want to mislead the Committee in any way whatever; I think one or two.

Mr. Kearley.

263. Originally there were 98 widows on this fund?—That is so.

264. At the present moment there are only 25?—That is so.

265. You have no cognizance of any other?—From the circumstances that we had no hold on them at all, and that they themselves believed that they would have no further claim on the fund.

266. From your records, extending over a considerable period, you are able to trace the fact that 54 did re-marry, but as to where these 54 re-married persons are, you have no evidence?—None whatever.

Mr. Mowbray.

267. There were originally 98, and now there are 25, how can you account for the difference between 25 and 98; there are 19 to be accounted for?—It looks like it; it is a little difficult to just put one's hand upon the source of information, but I know I have it somewhere.

Chairman.

268. I will put a question and perhaps you will fill it up on your evidence. An honourable Member calls attention to the fact that the numbers on the fund originally were of widows of non-commissioned officers and privates, 98; their numbers are now reduced to 25?—That is so.

269. You have told the Committee that three only of that original number have died, 54 have remained, and have so forfeited their claim; there remain 25; will you explain to the Committee what has become of the 16 who are unaccounted for?—I will get that information for the Committee.

270. Now turning to the loss of Her Majesty's ship "Atalanta" on her return from Bermuda in the year 1880, the date not exactly known; she must have gone down with all her officers and crew, is that so?—That is so.

271. The circumstances excited a great amount of sympathy, and a public meeting was held at Portsmouth at which it was decided to raise a fund; can you state what was the amount of the fund so raised?—The total amount that was transferred to the Commissioners (for the transfer did not take place until July 1881) was 9,075*l.*, together with 200*l.* subsequently received.

272. For that 12 months then preceding the transfer of the fund to the Commissioners its administration had been entirely in the hands of the local committee?—Of the local committee.

273. Will you state the numbers placed on the fund, placed by the Patriotic Fund Commissioners I take it?—By the committee that originally raised it. In all these funds the committees dealt with the claims in the first instance and transferred them to the Commissioners.

274. Are the numbers that you are about to give us the numbers originally dealt with or the numbers the responsibility of dealing with which was transferred to the Commissioners?—Those numbers that I am about to give you were those transferred to us by the committee under the deed: three widows of officers, two mothers of officers, eleven children of officers, 24 widows of petty officers and seamen, and 36 children of petty officers and seamen.

275. What allowances were the Commissioners advised that they might safely sanction?—The fund, as you will observe, was a very small one indeed; it was, in fact, the poorest fund that has been placed under the administration of the Commissioners, and the allowances were consequently very small; the widow of a staff-surgeon was granted 17*l.* per annum, and 12*l.* for each child; the widow of a navigating lieutenant was granted 16*l.*, and 12*l.* for each child per annum; the mother of a paymaster was granted 15*l.* per annum; the widow of a gunner was granted 8*l.* 10*s.* per annum, and 8*l.* for each child; the daughter of a boatswain was granted 16*l.*

16*l.* per annum; and the mother of a boatswain was granted 10*l.* per annum. If an explanation should be thought necessary of the difference between the allowance to the widow of a gunner and the mother of a boatswain, and the daughter a boatswain (those amounts seem almost as if they were inverted), the difference is caused by the fact that the Admiralty gave 22*l.* a year to the widow of the gunner.

276. I will ask you upon that point presently; will you proceed to tell us what was done with regard to the petty officers and seamen?—The widow of a chief petty officer had 3*s.* 6*d.* a week with 2*s.* 6*d.* for the first child, and 1*s.* 6*d.* for each other child; a first-class petty officer's widow had 3*s.* a week, with the same allowance for children as granted to the widow of a chief petty officer; the other ranks below that had 2*s.* 6*d.* a week only, but they had 2*s.* a week for the first child and 1*s.* 6*d.* a week for tho second child.

277. Those figures generally are considerably less than the allowances made from the "Captain" Fund for instance?—Yes. The allowances to children were relatively exceptionally good as compared with the Zulu War Fund. In that fund it was only 1*s.* per week that was granted at the outset for the children; but in the case of the children who came upon the "Atalanta" Fund, I suppose, owing to the experience that the Commissioners had gained in the previous fund, they made higher allowances relatively for the children, and you will see that they are considerably higher than in the case of the Zulu War Fund.

278. Will you explain if the general tendency of the experience of the Commissioners in administering these different funds has led them to recognise the policy of making more generous allowances in the case of children?—That as I think is illustrated rather by the exception to the general rule in this very fund of the "Atalanta," that is to say that the principle that there obtained was that a widow with children deserved higher relative allowance as having children to provide for than a widow without children; but in the other funds, of course, the allowances were higher for the widows again, and consequently the allowances for children were not relatively so high as in the case of the "Atalanta." It is, in fact, a case of the exception proving the rule. The special circumstances of the "Atalanta" seemed to demand this particular treatment, which is not one entirely of principle. It was so poor a fund that no allowances on remarriage were granted in the "Atalanta" Fund.

279. I take it that the girls, the orphan girls particularly, or the girls who have lost their fathers, were entitled to the benefits of the Patriotic Asylum?—And as a matter of fact 10 girls were taken into the Royal Patriotic Asylum; out of the 36 children altogether, 10 girls were taken into the Royal Patriotic Asylum, and not charged for to the "Atalanta" Fund.

280. And that enabled the Commissioners to deal more generously with the boys for whom provision had to be made?—With the widows.

281. With the widows and the boy children?—No, not the boys; because, already those women with families were, in consideration of their having families, given higher relative allowances for the children; these were therefore not increased.

282. That is to say, there was no direct allowance made to the child, but the allowance to the mother was greater in proportion to the number of children she had to provide for?—That is so.

283. Now I come to a matter of considerable importance: You said that in fixing these allowances, and you particularised the question of the widow of a gunner and the daughter of a boatswain, and so on, you took into consideration the allowances made by the Admiralty?—That is so.

284. What is the nature of the allowances which may be counted upon in the event of a disaster of this kind from the Admiralty?—When the "Atalanta" Fund was raised no allowance whatever could be counted upon from the Admiralty for those below the rank of officer. The Greenwich Hospital Fund had not been allocated in those days, any portion of it for the benefit of widows and orphans except in the shape of gratuities: not in the shape of allowances to widows and orphans.

285. Will you particularise the allowances to which widows of officers were entitled up to 1880?—The allowances, of course, are governed by the Naval Regulations, and in the Naval Regulations there are, I think, three rates of allowances for each rank, that is to say, for death under ordinary circumstances, death by drowning, or death by being killed in action; and thus it may be that the widow of a lieutenant killed in action would get considerably more than a lieutenant who had simply lost his life in the ordinary circumstances. I am not able to say off-hand what those rates are, but I should say, taking this navigating lieutenant whose widow here gets 16*l.* from the "Atalanta" Fund, it would very likely be about 70*l.* per annum that she would get.

286. Then the allowances that you found that officers' widows were entitled to in consequence of the incident of the loss of the "Atalanta" would not be the highest or the lowest?—I rather think it would be the highest. I think in all these cases of disaster where vessels have been lost in such circumstances, the authorities have awarded to the widow the highest rate that they could award.

287. You have told the Committee that the fact of their being entitled to naval allowances of that kind made the task lighter on the part of the Commissioners, and that these allowances made from the "Atalanta" Fund were rather solatia than sums calculated for their maintenance?—Quite so.

288. But now let us come to deal with petty officers and seamen; to what allowances would they be entitled from naval funds?—In the case of the "Atalanta," absolutely none.

289. No gratuity of any kind consequent upon the disaster?—I think there was nothing but gratuities granted, the usual 12 months gratuities granted to the relatives of those that were lost; but certainly no permanent allowances.

Mr. Kearley.

290. Not at that time:—Not at that time, and not now. The Greenwich Fund allocation to widows and orphans was not with retrospective effect.

Chairman.

291. At what time were the Greenwich funds made available?—I think in 1883.

292. Now then, under these circumstances the allowances made for widows of those below the rank of officer were fixed originally at what?—At 3*s.* 6*d.* per week for the widow of a chief petty officer and so on, as I stated just now.

293. The figures that you have already given us as having been fixed originally were amended at a subsequent date?—In 1883 and in 1891, and they now stand at the same rates again as the Patriotic Fund were originally, that is to say 5*s.* a week for the widow of an ordinary or able-bodied seaman; 5*s.* 6*d.* per week for the widow of a second class petty officer; 6*s.* for the widow of a first class petty officer; 7*s* for the widow of a chief petty officer; with a further increase of 2*s.* per week on attaining 60 years of age.

294. And may we take it that the augmentation was graduated in regard to the "Atalanta" survivors very much in the same way as you have described in regard to the Zula War?—That is so; in fact, the proportion of benefits that the "Atalanta" Fund derived from the orphans being placed in orphanages at the expense of the Patriotic Fund was relatively greater perhaps.

Mr. Ramsay.

295. How long was the 2*s.* 6*d.* a week allowance paid for the children?—Up to 14 years of age for boys and 16 years of age for girls.

296. Were there any special steps taken to see that those children were alive?—That is part of the absolutely necessary machinery of any body that has to make a regular payment of allowances based upon existence. In reference to payments to children, we have advanced considerably, inasmuch as we require a school attendance certificate for every child that draws allowances between the ages at which the Elementary Education Act stipulates that they shall attend school. Consequently we have absolutely a separate identity and existence certificate rendered every quarter in connection with every child.

297. If a widow dies before her children have attained these ages, is there any augmentation in the allowance to the children?—As a matter of fact, I do not think such a case occurred in connection with the "Atalanta" Fund, but I may say that that rule is adopted when children are left entire orphans.

Chairman.

298. Then what you have told us in regard to the Zulu War Fund with regard to the allowances made in cases of sickness, applies also to the "Atalanta" Fund?—Yes.

299. And any surplus which may remain from that fund will be treated according to the provisions made in the Act of 1881?—Yes, and it is one of the funds actually scheduled in that Act of 1881.

Mr. T. Bayley.

300. Can we have the number that are now on the fund?—They are given on page 2 of the statement, Table 2. In the case of the "Atalanta" Relief Fund there are now five officers' widows, six officers' children, 10 widows of those below the rank of officer, and three children of those below the rank of officer.

Chairman.

301. In the case of widows and mothers the numbers remain as they were?—Yes.

Mr. Mowbray.

302. What is the limit of age for the officers' children?—Up to 18 years of age for boys, and 21 years of age for girls. That is, as a general rule, the limit of age in all the funds for officers' children?—Up to 18 years of age for boys, and 21 years of age for girls. That is, as a general rule, the limit of age in all the funds for officers' children; but in some of the funds, such as the Zulu War Fund, which was thought in the first instance to be insufficiently subscribed, the age was limited first to 18; but we have extended that.

Chairman.

303. Now the widows of petty officers and seamen of the "Atalanta" have gone down from 24 to 10; is that from re-marriage?—That is so.

304. Do you know how many have re-married, and how many have died?—I am afraid I cannot tell it off the book, and I am afraid of getting into the same mistake as before.

305. You tell us that in 1881 the sum of the "Atalanta" Fund transferred to the Commissioners was 9,075*l.*?—Plus 200*l.* subsequently received.

306. Am I right in saying that the capital now stands at 7,400*l.*?—That is correct.

Lord Edmund Talbot.

307. Are the children of the petty officers and seamen reduced from 36 to 3 in the "Atalanta" Fund?—Yes, necessarily; because the "Atalanta" was lost in 1880, and as the children all go off at the age of 14 for boys and 16 for girls, it stands to reason that certainly all the boys are off. In fact, I can tell you who are remaining in regard to that; it is, I think, three girls.

308. It is not from any death rate that the reduction has taken place?—None whatever; simply the limit of age has caused them to go off.

309. The limit of age for officers' children is longer?—Five years longer in the case of girls.

Mr. T. Bayley.

310. In 1893 you said the additional allowances in case of sickness were authorised to be issued; can you give us any estimate of what that amount is?—In the "Atalanta" the circumstances of the widows of the "Atalanta" have caused the issue of allowances greater in proportion than in the Zulu War Fund.

311. About how much?—Three widows I should think are in receipt of it now; one I think was half-a-crown a week extra; another I think has 2*s.* a week extra and so on, but from memory I should not like to say.

Chairman.

312. With regard to the fund known as "Soldiers' Effects," would you just tell the Committee something of the history of that fund before it was determined to apply it to the uses it now serves?—The Government of the day in 1881, as I pointed out in my evidence on the Patriotic Fund, decided that it was desirable to place under the Commissioners what was known as the "Deceased Soldiers' Effects" Fund, and consequently by a Royal Warrant dated the 12th June 1884 the accumulations at that period were transferred under the provisions of the Regimental Debts Act of 1863 to form the "Soldiers' Effects" Fund to be "under the management and control of our Commissioners for the time being of the said Patriotic Fund," and to be applied "for such of the widows and children or other near relatives of soldiers dying in our service, and generally in such manner for the benefit of such of the widows and children or other near relatives of soldiers dying as aforesaid" as the Patriotic Fund Commissioners "shall from time to time think fit."

313. That is the aggregate of funds to which the relatives of deceased soldiers would be entitled, but which had not been claimed by those who were so entitled?—That is so.

314. And they had accumulated in the hands of the War Office until it was determined as you describe to apply them to this particular purpose?—Yes.

315. Those funds were necessarily applicable to the relatives of common soldiers only?—Not to officers at all.

316. They were practically the property of the relatives of the soldiers, and under the provisions here made they were to be applied very much to the same purpose, the same class?—That is so.

317. Now, will you tell us the effect of the warrant of July 1887?—In administering the fund it was found that the machinery was somewhat cumbrous, and a further Royal Warrant was issued, dated the 16th of July 1887, which authorised the Executive Committee of the Patriotic Fund to "order and direct the payment and disbursement and application of the said "Soldiers' Effects" Fund, subject to "such orders and regulations as may from time to time be made" by the Commissioners of the Patriotic Fund. It was purely an administrative Warrant; it had no further effect.

318. You succeeded in carrying the Regimental Debts Act of 1893, which repealed the previous Statute, and a Royal Warrant was issued on the 22nd of August 1893. Can you tell us generally as to the provisions made in that Warrant as to administration and management?—The provisions of the Royal Warrant of the 22nd of August 1893 are as to administration and management the same as in the previous Warrants as quoted above, the main difference between the later Warrant and those issued previously being the definition in greater detail of the conditions affecting preferential consideration in regard to the cases of widows and children of soldiers on the married establishment to the following effect: to the effect that "preferential consideration" was to be given to the

"widows and children of those on the married establishment; first, who 'were killed in action, or died of wounds received in action, or from illness which can be directly traced to fatigue, privation, or exposure incident to active operation in the field within 12 months of sustaining such wounds or contracting such illness'; second, for those who 'died from an injury traceable to military duty within 12 months of sustaining such injury'; that is to say, the bursting of a gun or through being thrown off a limber. Then, third, 'died from illness directly traceable to fatigue, privation, or exposure in the performance of military duty.'"

319. A case occurred the other day to which I believe your attention has been called of a man, who from no fault of his own, met his death by accident in barracks; are you prepared to say whether that particular case is one which might be entitled to benefit under this fund?—Undoubtedly I should say. All cases of injury that have occurred from accidents which were in no way contributed to by the neglect of the soldier have been provided for since 1882, from the "Soldiers' Effects" Fund.

320. Will you tell us what was the amount of the first instalment of the fund that was transferred?—The first instalment in August 1884, handed over was 44,182*l.* 17*s.* 5*d.*, and sums have since been transferred yearly under the provisions of the Regimental Debts Acts of 1863 and 1893.

321. At what amount did the capital stand on the 31st December 1894?—£.125,607 10*s.* 6*d.*

322. You have told us in your evidence with reference to the "Zervudachi" Fund that it was contemplated at one time that that would be available for the survivors of those who had lost their lives in Egypt?—Yes, it was proposed at first to apply that entirely in the relief of families of those who lost their lives in Egypt.

323. The "Zervudachi" Fund now stands at 1,783*l.* whereas as you have told us you have got more than 125,000*l.* in the "Soldiers' Effects" Fund. The sum with which you have now to deal, therefore, is ample for the purpose, while that under the "Zervudachi" would have been very insufficient?—The "Zervudachi" Fund would undoubtedly have been swamped at once, by placing upon it the families of those who lost their lives, even in the first Egyptian Campaign of 1882; but the "Soldiers' Effects" Fund being of more than sufficient corpus to provide an income to pay the allowances that were approved of for such widows, and with the increments that have been received of recent years, it has provided not only for those families who were left without their husbands and fathers by the campaign of 1882, but all subsequent campaigns, wherever they may have been, and for all cases of those who come under the second catagory, dying from injury directly traceable to military duty.

324. Will you state the scale of allowances determined upon?—The scale of allowances is that which was agreed upon originally as the outcome of a committee which I believe sat at the War Office, and I think had relations with the Admiralty also, because the Greenwich Hospital

Chairman—continued.

Hospital Fund allowances are exactly the same, that is 3*s.* 6*d.* a week for the widow of a private, 4*s.* for the widow of a corporal, 4*s.* 6*d.* for the widow of a sergeant, and 5*s.* for the widow of a sergeant-major or colour-sergeant, with 1*s.* 6*d.* a week for each child of a private or corporal, and 2*s.* a week for each child of the ranks above that.

325. Those allowances are smaller than were those determined upon in regard to the Zervudachi Fund?—Yes.

326. Can you explain to us how with ample funds in the one case, and insufficient funds in the other, that decision was arrived at?—The decision was arrived at, as I say, by a Committee which, I believe, sat at the War Office; but, I believe, that these allowances were agreed upon on the assumption that very few of the widows would be anything but of a very young age for some time to come, as the married establishment of soldiers is, of course, limited to 6 per cent. of the rank and file, and they do not serve long with the colours; and in the Zervudachi Fund the first case that we had before us in connection with it was that of a widow of over 50 years of age, and the Commissioners felt that a higher scale was therefore warranted, as it was applicable only to the widows of men who had fallen in previous wars for which no charitable fund had been subscribed.

327. How do these figures compare with the present allowances under the Patriotic Fund proper?—They are very much less indeed, but there is very little doubt, I think, that following the policy that the Commissioners have invariably carried out, any funds that were able to bear increased allowances, which will be the case with this fund if there is no more put on to it by a war, they would, when the widows become older, under their powers, increase the allowances.

328. Allowances have been paid from the 1st of July 1882?—Yes; the Secretary of State in handing over the fund made that provision, particularly, in the Royal Warrant, with reference to the fact that the Egyptian campaign of 1882 had just concluded, leaving a number of widows and orphans unprovided for.

329. Then that has been in operation 13 years, and the time has hardly yet arisen for considering larger allowances for those who reach the age of 60?—That is the case.

Mr. Kearley.

330. This fund is not the outcome of benevolence in any shape or form?—In no shape.

331. It is the aggregate of the individual soldier's personal effects for which no claimant has come forward?—After the usual process provided for by the Regimental Debts Act.

332. And it includes the effects of men who desert?—You are asking me a question now which is quite out of the knowledge of the Patriotic Fund Commission. They deal with it not as effects, but as a sum handed over by the War office.

333. And you would prefer that we called somebody from the War Office to give us any information on that point?—Clearly; any answer of mine would be unauthoritative.

Mr. Kearley—continued.

334. Nothing has been contributed to the fund?—There is not one single penny that is contributed to it except under the provisions of the Royal Warrant, which is for the disposal of the unclaimed soldier's effects, that is the effects of soldiers who die, or effects which arise in other circumstances, as to which I cannot speak, are not claimed.

Chairman.

335. Now we will pass to the story of the Ashantee War Fund, the fund originally raised as the "Gold Coast Relief Fund," amounted to what?—Well, the circumstances of this fund are peculiar. There was no knowledge within the Patriotic Fund Commission, until the year 1888, as to the actual corpus of the fund.

336. The funds were not actually held by the Commissioners?—They were held by Messrs. Cox & Co., the army agents and bankers.

337. And Messrs. Cox & Co. honoured the drafts of the Commissioners, did they?—Yes, an arrangement was made by which the allowances that were agreed upon with the Committee that raised the funds, should be paid through our agency, Messrs. Cox & Co. honouring our cheques.

338. Then, although the funds were raised in 1874, it was not until 1888 that they were actually transferred to your custody?—That is so.

339. The amount, however, was always a small one?—So very very small that the original allowances were not only very small to the widows, but none could be granted to the children at all, and the children were relieved from the Patriotic Fund.

340. Could you tell me how many widows did actually receive assistance?—The number of widows placed on the fund in the first instance was 28, whose husbands belonged, 17 to the Navy and 11 to the Army.

341. What allowances did they receive?—The original allowances were: to the widow of a private, 2*s.* 6*d.* per week; to the widow of a corporal, 3*s.* per week; to the widow of a sergeant, 3*s.* 6*d.* per week; to the widow of a colour-sergeant, 4*s.* per week; and the same to corresponding ranks in the Navy.

342. Those may be compared with the allowances that were made out of the "Atalanta" Fund?—You will observe that they are not quite the same. The "Atalanta" Fund only went up to 3*s.* 6*d.* a week for the widow of a chief petty officer, whereas this went up to 4*s.* per week.

343. You have told us that the fund did not allow of your giving any assistance to the children of officers or of privates?—Nor to children at all from the fund itself. They were relieved, however, from the Patriotic Fund.

344. Then we need not trouble ourselves any further with that, except to ask you at what amount it now stands?—The fund stands now at 2,000*l.*

345. That is very little less than what it was when it was handed to you in 1888?—£200 less.

346. Can you tell us how many claimants there there are upon it at the present moment?—They will be found in Table 2. They number eight widows now.

Chairman—continued.

347. Are there any applicants whose claims you have not been able to satisfy, do you know?—None.

348. When did the Commissioners find themselves in a position to increase by an extra shilling the weekly allowances?—The records are somewhat doubtful on that particular point, from the circumstances that I have alluded to; that, although we made the payments through our agency, the records were not kept in the same way as for funds for which the Commissioners felt they were responsible as reporting to Her Majesty year by year.

349. But since the date of your appointment there has been no alteration?—No; that was before I became secretary.

350. Now, passing to the next fund; the famous charge of the Light Cavalry Brigade at Balaclava in October 1854 led to the subscription in 1890 of a special fund independent of the Patriotic Fund?—Quite so.

351. Can you tell us about how many survivors there were in 1890?—I can only tell the Committee how many were transferred by the deed as eligible for relief under the provisions of the trust deed; for the relief to be afforded by the fund is applicable only under this trust deed, and the Committee did not transfer the balance of the fund originally subscribed to the Patriotic Fund Commissioners till February 1892; but out of the original corpus they spent more than one-half themselves in direct grants to such survivors as they thought deserving; and they classified certain men, I understand, as undeserving; and consequently there may be some of these who are not in the list which is attached to the deed.

352. May I take it that the original sum subscribed in 1890 was 6,753*l.* 1*s.* 4*d.*; that in 1892 the sum remaining unexpended and transferred to the Commissioners was 2,949*l.* 19*s.* 6*d.*?—That is the case.

353. And that it now stands at 2,700*l.*?—Yes.

354. That fund, unlike the most of those which you have been referring to, was not intended for widows and children particularly?—It cannot be applied to any but the survivors of the Light Cavalry Brigade charge of the battle of Balaclava, who are included in the schedules of the deed.

355. Now in what form are the grants generally given to them?—The provisions of the deed are very succinct in that respect; and they say that the money "shall be applied only to such as are in privation and want, and to pay to each of such pensioners (that is survivors that are eligible) such weekly sum and no more as will, together with any pension such person may receive from any public or private source, make up the sum of 7*s.* weekly;" that is to say, that if a survivor, as has been the case in many instances, gets a special pension from Chelsea, under the recent enactments of Parliament, say of 6*d.* a day, the Commissioners can only pay to him another 6*d.* a day.

356. And, of course, if he receives a campaign pension of 9*d.* a-day, you would only be called upon to give him 3*d.* a-day to augment it?—That is so.

Chairman—continued.

357. How many was it calculated that the fund would bear?—Originally six only, but in 1893, that is for the usual date, the end of the previous year, 31st of December 1892, the actuary reported that four more allowances equivalent to 7*s.* a-week might safely be awarded; and since that date that increased number of allowances in the aggregate has been awarded.

358. But you tell us that the number of survivors in receipt of assistance from the fund at the present time is larger than the number was previously?—That is explained by the fact to which I alluded just now, that it is not in the power of the Commissioners to give more than will make up to each man a total of 7*s.* a-week with any pension that he may have received.

359. Then as a matter of fact the survivors of the charge do not benefit at all under the arrangement by which Parliament has voted a special campaign pension?—Not specially.

360. I mean to say is it worth a man's while to apply to the fund?—Yes, so far as I can gather, the men are very glad to get even the few pence a day extra, it may be, in some cases.

361. You provide them with 7*s.* a week; if they get a campaign pension, whatever they may receive from Chelsea is deducted from the 7*s.* a week that you give; in what way is the veteran benefited by receiving this campaign pension?—He is not himself benefited more than it was intended by the deed he should benefited.

362. From the two funds from this Balaclava Fund, and from the campaign pension awarded him at Chelsea he cannot possibly have more than 7*s.* a week?—That is so.

363. But the aid given by Parliament, to whatever extent these survivors avail themselves of it, comes in relief of your fund and enables you to give more widely-spread assistance?—That is the effect; that, instead of our having on the fund, as was contemplated originally when the deed was drawn, when there were no special army pensions (because it was just immediately anterior to the passing of that measure) ten men, we have been able to extend the number owing to the fact that the special pensions go towards the maximum amount allowed under the deed.

364. Of course the amount is so comparatively small that it does not affect the policy of Parliament?—And the Light Brigade Fund is not saved by that fact, because we still go on taking the maximum number that the actuary says may be awarded, making an aggregate of 7*s.* a week.

Mr. Kearley.

365. Does that indenture appear on your reports?—It is not in our reports.

366. Could we have a copy of it?—It can be given. I regretted that we did not have it printed as has been done in the case of the "Victoria" Relief Fund; as I thought this a good plan; and it would have saved a good deal of trouble if it had been adopted earlier.

Chairman.

367. Now, we come to a particular fund in which an honourable Member of this Committee is is interested, the county of Forfar fund; that is a comparatively small sum that was subscribed in 1886 in the county of Forfar?—Not subscribed so far as I know. What the origin of the money was is not within our ken, but the county of Forfar said that they had this sum, which they wished to transfer to us.

368. Then you did not trouble yourself as to how it originated?—No.

369. It was handed over to the Commissioners of the Patriotic Fund in 1886?—That is so.

370. And what was the equivalent return made to the county in acknowledgment of that fund?—They obtained in respect of the payment of that sum over to the official trustees of the Patriotic Fund the right to nominate an orphan girl to the Royal Victoria Patriotic Asylum.

371. Is it at all conceivable that the particular girl who might be nominated from the county of Forfar would have failed to get admission if that fund had not been forthcoming?—That was, in fact, the origin of the idea which found expression later by the addition of a sum of 171*l.* 14*s.* 10*d.*, that any girl could get in at any time without any nomination of that kind, and that therefore the benefit was not one that it was worth while to continue.

372. But is the girl so nominated by the county to be qualified under the ordinary condition as being the orphan of a soldier?—Quite so, subject to the ordinary rules of eligibility.

373. Then there has been some change in the conditions of the fund since that date, has there not?—Yes; in 1892 the county authorities intimated that a further sum of 171*l.* 14*s.* 10*d.* would be paid over on some arrangement being come to for additional rights to be acquired by the county; and, as the outcome of the considerations to which I have alluded, it was thought that it would be appropriate to suggest that a new departure, which might, perhaps, be followed by other counties, should be put before the county authorities of Forfar, to the effect that if they would amalgamate the two sums together and surrender their right to nominate a girl to the Royal Victoria Patriotic Asylum, it being always understood that there would be no difficulty in any child getting in under ordinary circumstances, the income of the two sums would produce sufficient to allow of two widows of sailors, soldiers, or marines being paid allowances of 5*s.* a week, and that such widows should be nominated from time to time by the authorities of the County Council of Forfar, subject to such rules and regulations as might be considered necessary from time to time by the Commissioners of the Patriotic Fund.

374. Would there be at all likely to be two widows who might have escaped attention and assistance but for this fund?—I paid a visit to Forfar in a holiday, and it evoked the fact that not only were there easily obtained two most deserving widows, but they would have been glad if they had had funds to have placed a very much larger number of widows upon such a fund.

375. But how was it that those widows had escaped assistance?—Their husbands were not necessarily men who had had war service.

Chairman—continued.

376. Has the patriotic example of the county of Forfar had any imitators?—No, we regret to say not.

377. Now we come to a very important circumstance that arose out of the disastrous loss of Her Majesty's ship "Victoria." The news reached London, as you have told us already, on the 23rd of June 1893?—Yes.

378. And an appeal was made by His Royal Highness the President of the Commission, and was immediately responded to by the Lord Mayor?—Yes.

379. And as a result of the appeal made by the Lord Mayor a large sum was subscribed?—Yes.

380. The deed of trust was dated when?—The 21st of September 1893.

381. And under that deed the funds so subscribed were transferred to the Patriotic Fund Commissioners?—That is so.

382. Other funds were subscribed prompted by sympathy felt in consequence of the same disaster?—Yes.

383. At Portsmouth, for example?—Yes.

384. Can you tell us what happened at Portsmouth?—At Portsmouth a local fund was opened by the mayor of the borough immediately after that opened at the Mansion House, and a committee was formed under the mayor, which in effect ultimately became a committee of the Patriotic Fund Commission, as they were directly in touch with the Patriotic Fund Commission, from time to time as to the necessities of the widows and orphans, who were principally located at Portsmouth, the "Victoria" having been, in naval parlance, a Portsmouth ship.

385. But although I imagine the subscription was commenced about the same time as it was in London, it was not until the 30th of March in the following year that the local fund was transferred to the Patriotic Fund Commission?—That is so.

386. Was any aid given from that fund by the local committee in the intervening time?—I believe to a very very insignificant extent.

387. Can you tell the Committee what was the amount that was transferred to the Patriotic Fund Commissioners?—It was, in effect, the whole of the subscriptions that were raised at Portsmouth, less, I think, a sum of not more than about 100*l.* which was spent locally; and the sum transfered to the Patriotic Fund Commissioners was 5,535*l.*

388. And that was to be applied under the same conditions as those originally agreed to in the case of the Lord Mayor's fund?—That is so. They were furnished with a copy of the deed which had been entered into by the Lord Mayor with the Patriotic Fund Commission, and in their trust deed they followed that, actually quoting that deed in its terms.

389. There was another fund raised at Malta, was there not?—Yes.

390. And what was the amount of that transferred to the general fund?—The amount that was transferred was only a very small balance indeed, which remained on the 30th of June 1894, namely, 67*l.* 6*s.* 10*d.*

391. In the 12 months then that had intervened

vened between the time of the loss of the "Victoria" and the handing over of that fund, was there a local administration?—Completely; that is to say, that the Malta Relief Committee, which, although not in its inception called forth by the Patriotic Fund Commission, immediately placed itself in connection with the Patriotic Fund Commission, and it was arranged that they should out of local subscriptions continue the relief that they had administered in the very first outset, until their funds were practically exhausted, when the widows would be taken on the central fund, which was on the 1st of July 1894.

392. How far did that local committee at Malta act in correspondence with the Patriotic Fund Commissioners?—It was constituted at the request of the Patriotic Fund Commissioners, addressed to the naval commander in chief in the Mediterranean, who succeeded Sir George Tryon, who was lost in the "Victoria."

393. There were local committees established at other places besides Portsmouth and Malta?—Yes, at Devonport and at Chatham.

394. How far were those local committees affiliated, so to speak, with the Patriotic Fund Commission?—They were directly the outcome of the request of the Patriotic Fund Commissioners, made through the naval commanders in chief at those places with the primary object, as soon as funds were placed at the disposal of the Patriotic Fund Commissioners, of affording relief, but also of affording to the Patriotic Fund Commission that necessary information which is only to be obtained from local sources as to the circumstances of each family.

395. From what source came the funds which were distributed at Devonport and Chatham, for example?—At Devonport the total sum subscribed was remitted without any deduction whatever to the Lord Mayor at the Mansion House, the fact being that there were only, I think, two widows at Devonport of those that were lost in the "Victoria," and their circumstances did not call for supplementary aid, inasmuch as they had their pensions. One, I think, was the widow of a gunner, and the other the widow of a carpenter, and they had the Admiralty gratuities which sufficed for their needs, with, I believe, assistance from Miss Weston.

396. Then I may take it that from the first the Commissioners must have recognised the danger of multiplying forms of relief and of overlapping in regard to the distribution of these different funds. Could you tell the Committee what would be the different sources from which these survivors of those who were lost in the "Victoria" might look for assistance; supposing that fund had not been subscribed at all, for instance?—I think I can best answer that by reading the paragraph in the Report of the Royal Commissioners to Her Majesty, which dealt with the raising of this fund; the Report for 1894, the 32nd Report. May I give a general history in the words of the report? I do not think I could, with advantage, add to or take from it.

397. Please do so?—The Lord Mayor, in response to an appeal made by H.R.H. the

Chairman—continued.

Duke of Cambridge, President of the Commission, on the 23rd of June 1893, announced his intention to "open a fund for the relief of the widows, orphans, and dependent relatives of those who had lost their lives in the disaster which befel H.M.S. 'Victoria' in the Mediterranean, and that he would entrust the distribution of the fund to the Patriotic Fund Commission." Consequently, on the 29th of June, I was directed to address a letter to the Admiralty to enable the Commissioners, as was then their intention, to distribute, on the instant, relief from the funds to be afforded by the opening of a fund at the Mansion House. I need not read the letter in detail, because it was simply to ask for that necessary information, which could alone be afforded from official sources, of the men who it was known had lost their lives in the "Victoria," and the addresses of the families who were in this country.

398. Did you ask in that letter what assistance the Admiralty themselves were prepared to give?—Yes; I asked that, to facilitate the necessary arrangements for affording immediate relief to the families of those who were lost in the "Victoria," the Admiralty would furnish in separate lists, according to the ranks and ratings, the names of those who had so lost their lives; first, officers; second, warrant officers; third, chief petty officers; fourth, first-class petty officers; fifth, second-class petty officers; sixth, ordinary and A.B. seamen, or others ranking as such; and if against the name of each widow, orphan, and dependent relative could be entered the amount of any pension, allowance, or gratuity which would be contributed from public funds, or funds under the control of the Lords of the Admiralty for the benefits of these families.

399. Did you, in the same letter, press upon the Admiralty the precedent of the gratuities allowed on the loss of H.M.S. "Captain"?—Yes; I asked that I might be informed whether, following the precedent in the case of the loss of H.M.S. "Captain," a gratuity of a year's pay for each of those who had lost their lives would be handed over to the Patriotic Fund Commission, for distribution in weekly allowances, paid quarterly. This 32nd Report gives a history of the circumstances under which the Commissioners were placed in connection with the "Victoria" fund; and if I might give it in the words of this report, it would, perhaps, enable my evidence to be more complete than it otherwise would be. The letter was promptly acknowledged, but it was not till the 7th of August, and subsequently, that the information was furnished which I asked for.

Mr. Kearley.

400. By the Admiralty?—By the Admiralty. Meanwhile, correspondence had arisen between the First Lord of the Admiralty and the Lord Mayor and the Commissioners, which will be found in the appendix to the 32nd Report. As the result of that correspondence, the First Lord of the Admiralty conveyed to the Lord Mayor his concurrence in the draft of the deed of trust, by which the Mansion House Fund was ultimately placed under the administration of

Mr. Kearley—continued.

of this Commission. "It was not, however, until the 9th of August, that the first instalment of the Mansion House Fund was placed in the hands of the Patriotic Fund Commissioners. It follows, therefore, that from causes entirely beyond the control of the Patriotic Fund Commissioners, they had no power or means to convey immediate relief to the sufferers by the disaster to H.M.S. 'Victoria.' In accordance, however, with the usual practice, the immediate necessities had, in the meantime, been met by the continuance, for two months, by the Admiralty authorities, of the allotments previously made by the men lost to their families. This was followed by the prompt issue of Greenwich Hospital pensions to all the widows and orphans, and gratuities to other dependent relatives, varying from three to twelve months' wages of the men upon whom such relatives had been dependent; while the next of kin in every case received the balance of wages and Savings Bank deposits standing to the credit of each man at the date of the disaster. The amounts thus paid by the Admiralty were as follows": that is to say, up to the date on which this report was issued, which was the following May, but they were, for the most part, issued almost immediately: "To 83 widows and 135 orphans of men below the rank of warrant officers, Greenwich Hospital pensions, varying from 3*s.* 6*d.* to 6*s.* 6*d.* per week for each widow, and 1*s.* 6*d.* to 2*s.* per week for each child; also balance of wages due to deceased husbands, amounting, in the aggregate, to 1,057*l.* 9*s.*, paid to 80 of the widows. To other relatives of 224 men who were lost, gratuities, amounting in the aggregate to 2,937*l.* 19*s.* 3*d.* Balance of wages and Savings Bank deposits due to deceased men, 2,081*l.* 1*s.* 11*d.*, making together 5,019*l.* 1*s.* 2*d.* The immediate necessities of sufferers by the disaster were further amply cared for by the opening, on 27th June 1893, of a local fund at Portsmouth, out of which it was publicly notified that the immediate relief of all dependent sufferers would be undertaken, and Miss Weston, of the Royal Sailors' Rest, Portsmouth, to whom funds were being sent independently, agreed to work in connection with this local fund, and to distribute the relief approved of jointly by her and by the local committee. The total amount disbursed in this way at Portsmouth was 2,800*l.* or thereabouts."

Chairman.

401. Was that disbursed from the fund to which you have already referred as the Portsmouth Fund?—No, entirely by Miss Weston.

Mr. Kearley.

402. Funds contributed to her directly by the public?—Quite so.

403. Nothing whatever to do with the Portsmouth Fund?—Nothing whatever to do with the Portsmouth Fund; and that accounts for the fact that the Portsmouth Fund was handed over to us practically intact.

Chairman.

404. Have you anything further to say on that point?—I think what I have just read has answered your question.

Chairman—continued.

405. Now, it was with the information which you had thus obtained that the Commissioners set about to allocate, as they thought equitably, the funds which were placed at their disposal from the various contributions?—Yes.

406. By the way, you have not told us what the total amount voluntarily subscribed was. The aggregate is 73,265*l.* 12*s.* 11*d.*?—Yes; made up by 67,586*l.* 0*s.* 5*d.* from the Lord Mayor as the Mansion House Fund; 5,535*l.* from the Mayor of Portsmouth as the Portsmouth Fund; 67*l.* 6*s.* 10*d.* the balance unexpended of the Malta Fund up to the 30th of June 1894; and 77*l.* 5*s.* 8*d.*, a number of miscellaneous contributions that found their way to us direct.

407. And the 73,000*l.* odd has been diminished in the course of the time that you have had to deal with it until in December last it stood at 66,614*l.* 12*s.* 10*d.*?—That is the invested amount. Of course, the contributions in process of investment are diminished by the process of a premium having to be paid on certain stocks in which the money was invested. I have made that answer because of the way you put the question. I would not wish the Committee to believe that from 73,000*l.* liquid money there only remains 66,000*l.* to-day; there remains 66,000*l.* of invested capital, that is to say, that if we were to realise it to-morrow we should hope to get back the premiums that we paid on certain stock. For instance, we paid 102 per cent. for the Portsmouth stock, and so on.

Mr. Kearley.

408. You hope it would realise more than you gave for it?—Yes, we should hope to get the sum back again.

Chairman.

409. Can you tell us what amount has been expended?—Yes, 4,631*l.* has been expended in relief from the 1st of December 1893, to the 31st of December 1894; 73,000*l.* was subscribed, 4,631*l.* had been spent actually in relief; that sum, with the premium that was paid upon the stocks that were bought, accounts for the difference between the 73,000*l.* and the 66,000*l.*

410. Then with these funds at your disposal and with the information which you had got as to the income of the various applicants, what was the scale of allowances agreed upon by the Commissioners?—So far as the officers were concerned it followed exactly the scale which has been in force for the Patriotic Fund and other funds following the Patriotic Fund's scale, and it ran out thus: For the widows of fleet paymasters, fleet engineers, and chaplains, 53*l.* per annum, and 16*l.* for each child up to 18 years of age for boys, and 21 years for girls; engineers' widows 37*l.* per annum, and 12*l.* for each child; warrant officers' widows 22*l.* for the widow and 8*l.* for each child. Then as regards those below the rank of officer it would be impossible to give a table that would not cover a large space; but it is printed in extenso at pages 56 and 57 of the 32nd Report to Her Majesty, and is based upon the principle of the pay that the husband was in receipt of; and the allowances varied for chief and first-class petty officers from a minimum of 31*l.* to a maximum of 50*l.*; for second-class petty officers, seamen, and marines, from a minimum of 26*l.* to a maximum of 30*l.*, with an allowance of 2*l.* 12*s.* per annum for each child, which is 1*s.* per week; these allowances being in addition to the naval pensions and allowances from Greenwich Hospital Fund to which I alluded in my answer just now.

411. The daughters, I suppose, would be entitled to admission to the Patriotic Asylum?—There is one only in there now. They are entitled.

412. But how do you explain the fact of there only being one?—Well, the allowances that they receive are so good that they prefer the money allowance to having the advantage of maintenance; for they get the Greenwich Hospital allowances, and it is one of the rules of the Greenwich Hospital Fund that admission to an institution entails the loss of the allowance, the allowance being granted for maintenance or towards the maintenance.

413. Could you tell us, for example, what would be the total income of a child from these different sources?—Yes.

414. I think you told us before that in the return from the Admiralty it was stated that the Greenwich Hospital Pension varied from 1*s.* 6*d.* to 2*s.* a week for each child?—Yes; it would run out this way: that the combined allowance from the "Victoria" Fund and the Greenwich Hospital Fund for the widow of an able seaman, the lowest grade, would be 6*l.* 10*s.* per annum, and it would go up to 7*l.* 16*s.* for other classes under the rank of warrant officer.

415. Per child?—Per child.

416. The Commissioners did not limit the assistance merely to the widows and children, but they dealt with dependent relatives?—Yes.

417. Fathers or mothers, for example?—Even foster-mother, grandmothers, uncles, aunts.

418. You satisfied yourselves that they were to a sufficient degree dependent upon the man whose life had been lost, I suppose?—It was a condition of both the deeds that the sum was transferred only for the benefit of those who were dependent upon a man lost. The words "dependent upon a man lost" are in the deed.

419. Father, mother, and foster-mother had no claim excepting upon establishing that they were in necessitous circumstances and that they had been dependent upon the lost sailor?—Yes, that is so.

420. Now, what was the nature of the allowances made to the dependent relatives?—In some cases allowances for life—in fact, in the majority of cases, owing to the largeness of the fund, allowances for life—were granted varying to a maximum of 18*l.* 4*s.* per annum, that is 7*s.* per week, for the benefit of 151 persons; allowances for limited periods for the benefit of 94 persons. That class was principally a class in which a man contributed towards the maintenance of his brothers and sisters, and the allowances are calculated up to the period in which the girl would go off or the boy would go off according to our ordinary rule; that is to say, up to the age of 14 for boys and 16 for girls, then the allowance would cease. Then gratuities paid in a lump sum for the benefit of 108 persons; that was where the dependence was of a very slight character indeed.

421. In dealing with these special funds, the administration of which has been confided to the

Chairman—continued.

Patriotic Fund Commissioners and keeping the accounts separately, you make a charge for administration, I suppose?—Yes, of 4 per cent. on the income.

422. Has that 4 per cent. been arrived at by an experience of the general cost of administration?—It approximates as a matter of fact, as nearly as it is possible to approximate, to the actual cost for the past year, 1894, of the items for which it is professed the charge is made.

423. Then the cost to the fund for the last year of 4 per cent., calculated on the income from dividends, amounted to 84*l.* 10*s.*?—That is all.

424. But to that you add the cost of Post Office Orders, &c., and actuary's fee, bringing up the total cost of administration of this very large fund, so far as the fund itself is concerned, to 114*l.* 0*s.* 11*d.*?—Yes.

425. And you have worked out the percentage of what that cost is?—Yes, 2*l.* 9*s.* 3*d.* upon the aggregate amount afforded in relief for the same period; while, if the actuary's fee be excluded, 2*l.* 2*s.* 5*d.* per cent. was the cost; and if the office charges alone be taken, the cost was only 1*l.* 16*s.* 6*d.* per cent. on the expenditure.

426. And you have dealt with all the other funds of which you have been giving us the story on very much the same principle in regard to the charge for administration?—Only in the cases of funds that are able to bear it. There have been funds, such as the "Atalanta" Fund, for which, over a series of years, from its inception, no charge whatever was made.

427. That is to say, that the Patriotic Fund undertakes the whole cost, stationery, printing, and office expenses, and the rest of it, and has indeed provided for the children to a certain extent, without making any charge upon the fund itself?—That is so, in the case of poor funds.

428. You will be examined no doubt, and at some length probably, with regard to the policy of administration of the "Victoria" Fund; are you in a position to give the Committee any specific statements with regard to the income of what I may call the typical examples of widows of common sailors, for example?—At pages 56 and 57 of the 32nd Report there will be found the actual detail of the income enjoyed by the husband who was lost in the "Victoria." That information, in fact, was obtained from the Admiralty in answer to that letter that I have quoted just now; and it shows that in almost every case the income of the man who was lost varied even as compared with men in his own rank, that being due to the circumstances of the extra pay which is earned in a large battle-ship like the "Victoria"; and consequently that fact, which is not apparent in the administration of funds of an earlier date, governed the Commission from the very first in regard to framing the scale of relief for the widows.

429. That is to say, instead of limiting yourselves to a specific allowance according to the rank of the lost man, you ascertain what his actual income was?—Exactly so.

430. Now take the case of a man in the first class who had earned sums varying from 27*l.* to 46*l.* per year; you made a reference just now, in quoting from that letter from the Admiralty, to the allowances made by men on active service for the sustenance of their families at home; I suppose

Chairman—continued.

I suppose that is an allowance made by the consent of the man and is paid through the Admiralty?—Sometimes in the shape of an allotment, which is deducted from the man's pay, and regularly paid through the Accountant General of the Navy at the ports or places where the families are resident at home, or it is made in the shape of remittances quite independent of the Admiralty machinery.

431. Is there any kind of pressure, do you know, put by the Admiralty upon seamen on active service requiring them to provide for the support of their families at home?—None that I know of.

432. But every possible facility is afforded for the distribution of such sums as the men may be willing either to provide for by allotment or by remittances?—Yes; as you will see by column 10 in this Table, at page 57 of the 32nd Report. We give there the information (and you will see that it extends to a majority of cases) of the actual allotment made by each husband to his wife.

433. Then, are we to understand, to take the first name in Class I., that a man whose pay was 27*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.* a-year provided for his family by allotting 15*l.* out of that pay?—Yes.

434. And might that be taken as something like the general scale of the amount allotted by the men?—Relatively, I should think so; but, of course, in a big battle-ship like the "Victoria," the complement of the engine-room is very much higher paid than those of the same rating on the deck, and they were those who furnished the most victims in this particular case, and consequently you would find, if you cast your eye further down, that the income derived by some of these people is very considerable, going up in the case of a chief engine-room artificer to 127*l.* 15*s.*, and that that man allotted to his wife no less than 96*l.* per annum; and that accounts, if I may say so, for the liberality in principle of the allowances of the "Victoria" Fund.

435. Then you might take that as a sort of datum line, that the men were in the habit of allocating for the support of their families a certain sum, and I suppose you undertook to provide that the allowances that the widows and families were to be in receipt of afterwards should not be less than what they had been accustomed to receive?—In the majority of cases. In that one case that I have just called attention to the artificer remitted 96*l.* per annum; but the total income derived by the widow from the Greenwich and "Victoria" Funds combined amounts to 65*l.* 12*s.*

436. I was asking you just now to give us a typical example to show us in such a case what would be the income available for the support of a man's wife and family while he was on service, and what the aggregate sums to which they would become entitled on the one hand from the Greenwich Fund or any other naval sources of a permanent kind, and on the other hand from the allowances from the Patriotic Fund?—You will find the detail in each case of every widow that was placed upon the "Victoria" Fund, below the rank of officer, given in columns 5 and 6 of that same statement to which I referred, and you will see that the allowances from the "Victoria" Fund as a rule are considerably in excess of the allowances from the Greenwich Hospital Fund; and the explanation of that is that the Greenwich Hospital Fund is graded entirely by rank, whereas the "Victoria" Fund is graded on the pay of the husband.

437. Shall we take a case?—The very top one is the widow of a private of the Royal Marine Light Infantry.

438. That is almost an exceptionally low income, perhaps?—But it is very typical of the advantages derived from the "Victoria" Fund. The pay of the husband was 27*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.*, but the widow will get 16*l.* 18*s.* from the "Victoria" Fund, and 9*l.* 2*s.* from the Greenwich Hospital Fund.

439. £.26 altogether?—Making a total of 26*l.*, which you will see approximates very closely to the pay of the husband.

440. But that is for the widow only?—That is for the widow only; she gets in addition 6*l.* 10*s.* for each child from the "Victoria" Fund and from the Greenwich Hospital Fund combined, bringing the total income up to 39*l.* against the 27*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.* of pay enjoyed by her husband, and the allotments that he made to her of 15*l.* It may fairly be said therefore that that widow is in very improved circumstances pecuniarily.

441. As a matter of fact she is distinctly a gainer in the gross income that she finds herself now in possession of for the maintenance of herself and her children over and above what was available from the earnings of the husband in money for himself and his family?—Most decidedly so.

442. Of course the husband, in addition to his pay, had rations and clothing?—Of course.

443. Now is there any other case that we might take; would you like to go to the next man?—Well, they all so very much vary, being based, so far as the "Victoria" Fund goes upon the question of pay, that you will find of course great contradictions as you go down the list. It is almost impossible to make an exact classification and take out any typical case.

Commander Bethell.

444. Able seamen are very typical?—Even of that rating, one man will draw, if he happens to be a stoker, 39*l.* 10*s.* 10*d.*, and you will go down and find that they go as low as 28*l.*

Chairman.

445. One particular able seaman, No. 23, has no children; that is hardly a typical case. Take Matilda Nicholls, for instance, No. 45, her husband was an able seaman; he was in receipt of 41*l.* 1*s.* 3*d.*; he left one child and the allowance from the "Victoria" Fund was 20*l.* 8*s.*; 9*l.* 2*s.* from the Greenwich Hospital Fund, making 29*l.* 10*s.*, with an allowance of 6*l.* 10*s.* for a child aggregating 36*l.* as against the 41*l.* 1*s.* which was the amount of his earnings on service?—Yes.

446. Now might I just ask you, do not you think it would be worth while if we had the totals of these figures on this page?—The totals paid out in allowances do you mean?

447. The total of each column?—Yes; that can be

be done. I was going to see whether we have not that done in the accounts. You would see, for instance, that this totalled up for the year 1894, on page 47 of the 33rd Report, to 3,367*l.* 13*s.* 3*d.*

448. But I meant the totals for comparison?—I will have that done.

449. I think I need not detain you longer upon that; but let us take the general principle of the administration of the fund. You have told us that you charge to the different funds that are able to bear the cost of their own administration at the rate of 4*l.* per cent. on the income?—Yes.

450. And that that works out upon the expenditure a maximum of 2*l.* 9*s.* 3*d.* per cent., which is the general cost of the management of the Commission as a whole?—In Table 1 of the Statement it will be observed that the aggregate expenditure from the different funds amounted to 39,759*l.* 8*s.* 10*d.* for the year 1894, and out of that 2,362*l.* 2*s.* 5*d.* represented what was expended in management and distribution of relief.

451. And you calculate that as giving a percentage of less than 6 per cent.?—Less than 6 per cent. upon the aggregate.

452. Upon the aggregate expenditure?—Upon the aggregate expenditure.

453. That includes salaries, stationery and printing, postage, travelling expenses, auditing, office expenses, fuel, light, &c.; commissions on Post Office orders, fees of actuary for valuations, and certain retired allowances to former members of the staff?—That, in fact, includes every possible item except relief; the remainder that is given in the first column here is relief pure and simple which reaches the hands of the recipients.

454. Naturally one would ask for some kind of standard of comparison to enable us to judge whether that was a large percentage or a small one; do you know of any other fund at all analogous to your own with which we could make a comparison?—No; I have tried to find for comparison the work of some Body that did perform analogous work, but I can find none that is exactly analogous in its work, or in the sphere of its operations, with which any just comparison in regard to its cost of management could be made. There is certainly no body in connection with the Navy and Army administering trusts for the benefit of the widow and the orphan of such value or of so varied a nature and extended over so wide a sphere of operations embracing, as this does, the furthest outlying British possessions.

455. You do not admit that it is fair to make a comparison with a separate administration of one of the "Thunderer" funds, for example, but you have before you the actual figures which were published in the "Army and Navy Gazette" of a year's working of one of those funds?—Yes; and that is a typical instance of what a fund loses by not coming under the administration of a body which administers a number of funds in common; because in this particular case overtures were made for the fund being placed under the Patriotic Fund Commissioners, but these did not result in its being so placed under their administration. They published their accounts in the papers; and it is from that published statement that I give the following particulars.

456. We need not trouble you with that if you will tell us what percentage on the expenditure appeared to represent the cost of management?—The expenditure worked out for the year 1892 at exactly 15·27 per cent.

457. And if that fund had been entrusted to the management of the Patriotic Fund Commissioners your charge would, of course, have been much less than that?—Less than half, at the very outside.

458. Is it too early to ask whether the accounts have been published of the Royal Naval Fund?—Yes, they have been published for last year.

459. Are you in a position to say what the cost of administration is there?—Yes. The amount of expenses for the year 1894 was 99*l.* 17*s.* 8*d.*, and the expenditure in relief was 1,031*l.* 10*s.*; so that as nearly as possible it is 10 per cent.

460. But do you mean that 99*l.* pays office expenses, stationery, printing, and salaries?—It does. They only pay 15*l.* for rent of offices; it is a little room in Craig's Court; I think the Royal Naval Club has something to do with it.

461. I will not detain you to explain to the Committee how such a fund as the "Atalanta," for example, was made available, or the arrangement by which it was incorporated with the Patriotic Fund; but as a matter of fact the income from that fund has been made available to the extent that it has, simply by the economical arrangements which the Patriotic Fund Commissioners have made?—It would have been impossible to have granted the allowances, small though they were, as I pointed out in my earlier evidence, if it had not been for the fact that the administration for the first six years was carried on under the Patriotic Fund Commission, absolutely free of expense to the fund itself; and you will observe if you look at the table that I give at the foot of page 18 of the statement that the allowances were relatively considerable; that is to say, that in the year 1882, the second year of the inception of the fund, they amounted to 552*l.*

462. The income being 348*l.*?—£348.

463. But under this happy arrangement which you think has worked out so well, the benefits from the "Atalanta" Fund have been extended and augmented on more than one occasion?—Yes.

464. The allowance, for example, to seamen originally fixed at 2*s.* 6*d.* was increased to 3*s.* 6*d.* in 1883, and to 5*s.* in 1891?—Yes.

465. And your contention is that that could not have been done if the fund had been administered independently?—It simply could not have borne the cost of management at all except under honorary conditions.

466. Under such conditions as those that the Royal Naval Fund appears to be administered under?—And that is 10 per cent.

467. Now you have maintained pretty steadily in the course of your evidence the assertion of the policy which seems to have animated the Patriotic

Chairman—continued.

Patriotic Fund Commissioners from their first appointment down to the present time, namely, that allowances are to be made according to what you hold to be the necessities of those who participate?—Clearly.

468. That the Commissioners invariably satisfy themselves that the applicant has no independent source of income, and that the grants given will not have the effect of maintaining them in indolence?—That is so, clearly.

469. Have the Commissioners regarded it as part of their duty in the case of widows to encourage them to maintain a spirit of independence?—That has been absolutely the initial feature as given expression to in the original Commission of the 7th of October 1854: that the relief to be afforded from the Patriotic Fund was to be limited undoubtedly to those who were unable to maintain and support themselves.

470. Now, reverting for a moment to the large fund that came into your hands through the Lord Mayor for the assistance of those who were dependent upon the men lost in the "Victoria," are you able to say how far the Lord Mayor in handing over those funds to your control concurred in that general principle of the Commissioners?—Well, of course, in regard to the "Victoria" Fund there were features to which I have referred slightly in my previous evidence which did not operate in any of the funds which had been previously transferred to the Commissioners, and in any case one of the fundamental observances of the Commissioners in regard to administration is to obtain from those who hand over funds clearly the conditions under which those funds are to be applied; and although there may be in regard to the "Victoria" Fund some slight inconsistency with the principle to which you have just alluded, it should be remembered that the fund had to be transferred under a deed of trust, as agreed to by the Lord Mayor of London and the Mayor of Portsmouth, the provisions of which were concurred in by the First Lord of the Admiralty.

471. But has there been ever at any time on the part of those who confided funds to the administration of the Patriotic Fund Commissioners any complaint that you had misinterpreted the intention of those who were responsible for the collection of these funds, any complaint that you had not administered these funds with a sufficient amount of generosity?—There has been no such complaint; on the contrary, so far as the "Victoria" Fund is concerned, there has been absolutely no single complaint received from any source whatever.

Chairman—continued.

472. Have you had complaints from the subscribers to those funds that you have not been sufficiently generous?—Not one single complaint has ever reached us from any subscriber.

473. I will not trouble you to repeat what you have already said, but I will ask you to sum up in a general recapitulation the main features which you have indicated of the work of the Commissioners?—The work of the Commission shows the following main features:—First, that the placing of additional funds to the original Patriotic Fund under the administration of the Commission has not been the result of any acquisitive or aggressive policy on the part of the Commission, but has been the result of the policy indicated by the Legislature or the Government of the day on the one hand, or of action arising out of resolutions adopted at public meetings on the other. Secondly, that in the case of every trust the original conditions have been faithfully observed, and that in the majority of the trusts the benefits now derived by the recipients are greater (in some instances considerably greater) than those derived at the inception of each trust. Thirdly, that while these increased advantages to recipients have been afforded, the Commissioners, in part by the skill with which they have made their investments, have obtained surpluses of assets over liabilities, which afford not only additional security for the permanent maintenance of these increased allowances, but, under the policy indicated by the Legislature in regard to surpluses of the various funds, also the means ultimately of contributing to the provision, which could be made in no other way, for the families of sailors and soldiers who lose their lives by accidents incidental to naval and military service which, owing to the small number of persons affected or to want of publicity, do not attract the spontaneous charity of the public. If this be true, can it be reasonably doubted that the lesson to be learnt is, that the placing of all funds for the benefit of the widows, orphans, and others by casualties incidental to naval and military service, however caused, under one administrative body, instead of under separate organisations, should be productive of the best results, alike in the interests of the dependents on our sailors and soldiers as in the interests of efficiency and economy of the administration of trusts created for such dependents by public philanthropy.

WILLIAM WOODALL, Esq., IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. Alexander John Finlaison, C.B., called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

474. Will you explain to the Committee the official position that you hold in the Civil Service?—I am the Actuary to the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, but it is part of my appointment to take the references that are made to me by the Treasury on behalf of the Government Departments generally.

474.* And the Treasury place your services at the disposal of the different Government Departments, do they not?—That is practically what it comes to.

475. Are you a professional actuary?—I am. I have been a professional actuary for many years. At the present time I have the honour of being the President of the Institute of Actuaries, the recognised body of the profession.

476. I have before me your report, which is described as "The Annual Valuation of the Assets and Liabilities of the Patriotic Fund," and issued the 27th February last?—Yes.

477. Are you in the habit of preparing such a report as that year by year, or only from time to time, when called upon?—The Royal Commissioners of the Patriotic Fund have made references and asked me to prepare statements of the various funds that are under their management from time to time, and it has been their practice as to the principal fund, the Patriotic Fund itself, to make such a reference every year. That is, I presume, the reason why I have used that expression in the last report that I made to them.

478. Am I to understand, though you call it an annual valuation, you do not accept the responsibility of making an annual survey of the position of the funds?—No. I should only have described this as an annual valuation from the practice which has grown up of the Commissioners referring this particular fund to me every year.

479. You succeeded in these responsible duties your father, did you not?—My father was my predecessor in office at the National Debt Office, and I succeeded him there in 1875.

Chairman—continued.

480. Was he consulted from time to time by the Commissioners from a very early period of their history—He had been in the habit of being consulted by the Commissioners of the Patriotic Fund during its formation. As far back as in 1855 and 1856 he was in communication with the Commissioners. I believe that his earliest report is dated in 1856. He took a great deal of interest in the fund, and was in the habit of reporting on it up to the year 1881. The first report I had the honour of making to the Commissioners was in 1882, but I am acquainted generally with the reports before that time.

481. Then from the first constitution of the Commission up to 1882 your father was the actuarial adviser, and since that year you have held the post?—May I, to put it distinctly, say that references were made to my father up to 1881, and references have since been made to me, but so far as I am aware, I hold no post whatever in connection with the Fund.

482. That, I think, will be easily made clear; I understand that you do not accept the responsibility for anything that has been done; that your task is limited to the giving of a report upon certain materials submitted to you from time to time by the Commissioners?—Quite so; I accept the full responsibility for everything which is contained in the reports I have made, but beyond the reports I have not been concerned in any way with the management of the Royal Commission.

483. You do not feel it your province even to follow the action of the Commissioners in what they have done upon your report?—No; at a subsequent time I may probably have made reference to any action of the Commissioners which had affected the general state of things; but but in no other sense have I followed the action of the Commissioners.

484. Upon what information did you furnish your estimates?—Detailed information has been supplied to me from time to time in schedules that have been specially prepared at the office of the Royal Commissioners. For instance, the great part of the liabilities of the Fund consisted of the pensions they are actually paying the widows, re-married women, and the promises that have been made for the increase of those pensions in certain eventualities when the women attain older ages; and the restoration to full pension, or another rate of pension, to women who have re-married and may return to form a charge on the Fund. All this information has been supplied to me in a form to which I have agreed, which gives the ages of the women, the different rates of pensions of which they were in receipt, and statements as to the prospects held out to them—I do not know whether I can call them exactly promises—but the proposals the Commissioners have made from time to time for the increase in certain eventualities, or, on the other hand, if a woman were to re-marry, for a diminution of her allowance.

485. Then your judgment and the conclusions at which you have arrived are based upon full detailed information furnished you by the Commissioners?—Quite so.

486. Have you access to the books, and are you able to verify, or do you feel it your duty to test, the accuracy of any of those returns furnished to you?—No, in no way except to this extent. I have made the references which are usual amongst the members of my profession. I have seen that the actual expenditure as contained in these reports has compared as near as I should expect to the information that has been supplied to me. That is to say, I have estimated, for instance, in the report to which you made reference just now, that the allowances to the widows that were returned to me were 15,411*l.* a year, and re-married women about 2,945*l.* a year. I have found, in a general way, that they have corresponded to the accounts which are published in the report that shows the expenditure of the year, sufficiently to give a general confidence in the schedule which had been furnished to me.

487. I only wanted to make it clear, you have no responsibility in drawing up the statement of accounts?—None whatever.

488. Nor do you accept the ordinary accountant's responsibility of verifying them?—Certainly not.

489. They were verified by Mr. George H. Tripp, I observe?—He is the auditor who is appointed by the Treasury under the provisions of the Act which regulates to a great extent the procedure of the Commission; an Act passed, I think, in 1867.

490. Are you able to say how far Mr. Tripp is independent of the control of the Commissioners themselves?—He is supposed to be certainly entirely independent of their control. He is appointed, not by the Commissioners themselves, but by the Treasury.

Chairman—continued.

491. Appointed as an independent check on the account-keeping of the Commissioners?—Certainly.

492. Now I will leave further questions as to the actual present state of the accounts, and ask you if you will inform the Committee—I suppose it is within your knowledge—as to the inquiry which took place in the year 1880?—Yes.

493. Mr. Lefroy and a gentleman afterwards known to us as Sir Robert Hamilton were appointed a special committee to make an investigation into the then condition of the Fund, and their report indicated that the expenditure of the then Commissioners exceeded their resources?—Yes.

494. Quoting from the nineteenth Report at page 20, I find that Lord Morley, to whom those two gentlemen reported, sent on their report to the Commissioners, and in his letter he stated that the communication showed that at a reasonable estimate the liabilities of the Royal Commission exceeded their assets by about 150,000*l.* How far did your father agree with the conclusions of Sir Robert Hamilton and his colleague?—I am afraid, if you will permit me, that I must make a little preface to my answer to that question. The expression "liabilities" is there used, but may I say with reference to the use of that particular word in relation to the Royal Commissioners of the Patriotic Fund, that I do not apprehend that the Royal Commissioners ever had any liabilities in the sense in which that phrase is generally used; for instance, an insurance company has definite contracts; it has issued policies of insurance to pay certain fixed sums at certain dates, and the liabilities under which can be measured. I do not know that the Commissioners had ever made any definite promise with reference to the rates of pensions they contemplated to pay in future, or how far they had embarked in the maintenance of the schools they then had under their control. At that time it is in my recollection that there was a discussion and projects were going forward for the establishment of a sanatorium by the seaside, and various other things of that kind. If all those were to be called definite liabilities I should agree with the statement that was made by Lord Morley; but I should prefer to put it in the way that my father advised the Commissioners at that time that they were contemplating engaging in a larger expenditure than the amount of funds which they were managing would be able to satisfy.

495. You draw the distinction between the contract liabilities of an insurance company, for example, and the position of a Board of Commissioners who desire to carry out a certain scale of gratuitous allowances, providing their money enables them so to do?—Exactly so. I think that was the position, and is the position still, of the Royal Commissioners. For instance, in my last report the word "liabilities" is used, and the account is headed "Liabilities"; but a reference to the valuation balance-sheet will show that amongst what is set down there as liabilities (I am referring to page 22 of the last report) the only strictly current liabilities are the items which are stated to be the allowances and annuities actually in course of payment. Then that is followed by a provision for deferred extra allowances, including additions of the large sum of 31,000*l.* The course which the Commissioners have laid down for themselves of increasing the annuities granted to the widows of soldiers and seamen when they attain older ages hardly makes them of the nature of the liabilities of an insurance company. They only contemplate paying these sums in case the money in the fund will be sufficient to do so. According to the nature of the assets they hold and the amount of them they will be fully enabled to do so, but the liabilities of the fund are not so in the same sense as the contracts of an insurance company. Then going back to 1881, to which reference has been made, the Commissioners then were understood to have laid down for themselves a certain programme, which will be seen in detail in the report in your hand, showing what the Commissioners had proposed then to do. I am speaking now from recollection. They proposed to maintain a boys' school at Wandsworth, and I believe they had also in contemplation the establishment of a sanatorium somewhere by the seaside. If they had carried out the whole of that programme Lord Morley's contention would have been correct.

496. I will take it that the effect of the report of Messrs. Lefroy and Hamilton to the Secretary of State for War was to convey the idea that the funds at the disposal of the Commissioners were insufficient to enable them to carry out strictly the whole of the programme on which they had set their minds?—Yes.

497. Will you tell the Committee whether, in consequence of that investigation, your father was asked to prepare a special actuarial report under the circumstances?—He was asked to prepare a report. I see it is dated in October 1880, and I presume, as that is an unusual period of the year, it would be a special report, but it is not in my recollection whether it was so in any special way.

498. Lord Morley's letter is dated August?—The report seems to appear as if it was an ordinary report that was made in the usual way. It concludes certainly with a very emphatic statement of my father's view on the subject.

499. Will you read the concluding sentence of that report?—"It now becomes a subject of imperative necessity to consider what part of the benevolent programme of the Commissioners should be relinquished, for, in default of an addition to its income, the expenditure now said to be in contemplation will exhaust the assets of the general fund in the period when survivors of the present body of pensioners will remain to claim the widow's allowance."

500. Then your father formed, after a careful actuarial investigation, the general conclusion arrived at by Messrs. Lefroy and Hamilton and accepted by the Secretary of State, and communicated in that particular warning sentence by Lord Morley to the Patriotic Fund Commissioners?—Certainly. The passage which I have read will be found in the 19th Report of the Royal Commissioners, dated the 6th May 1881.

501. Is there anything else contained in your father's report which you would like to call the special attention of the Committee to?—I presume it has been the practice that all these reports are subsequently presented to Parliament.

502. I will only ask you this, whether you accept the conclusions to which your father gave the weight of his authority on that occasion?—Certainly, entirely so, and it was at that stage that I took up, if I may say so, the duty of making reports to the Royal Commissioners myself. (Parliamentary Papers C. 2956, C. 3001, Lord Morley's letter of the 28th August 1880, page 20 of the 19*th Report of the Commissioners, and the Actuary's Report, page* 22 to 25 of the same Report, put in.)

503. At that time, then, it was made clear to the Commissioners that it would be necessary for them to curtail their expenditure in certain directions if they were to keep faith with the reasonable expectations of those who were beneficiaries of the fund?—Yes.

504. Was that course followed?—The boys' school was sold and large funds were realised from it, and therefore the Commissioners were in this position; instead of having a source of expenditure on their hands they had an increase of assets.

505. By the sale of the asylum for boys and by the abandonment of the sanatorium to which you have referred?—Nothing more was heard of the sanatorium; it was only, as far as I know, a scheme in the air at the time that was discussed. The sale of the boys' school, I believe, was under an Act of Parliament that was passed in 1881.

506. We have the story as to that on the evidence; the Act of 1881 empowered the Commissioners to carry out some of the economies the necessity for which were enforced by the actuarial report?—That was so.

507. Are you in a position to state how far the surplus capital funds at the disposal of the Commissioners compare at the present time with the state of things to which we have referred in 1880?—As I said, instead of the boys' school being a source of expenditure to the fund, the proceeds of the land became an addition to the assets. At this time the secretary, Colonel Young, could tell you more authoritatively than I can as to whether this particular asset was transferred to the account of the Patriotic Fund, or transferred to the endowment of the institution which is still in existence. It is not in my recollection at this moment. From that time the surplus at the disposal of the Royal Commissioners has steadily increased. To a very large extent this increase has been owing to the great rise which has taken place in the value of the securities in which the fund was originally invested as far back as between 1856 and 1860, above the prices given for many of the securities, some of which are, I believe, now still held by the Commissioners. From a list in the fourth Report published in 1863, they then had 80,000*l.* of of Great Western Debentures. They still hold 69,000*l.* of those. These debentures were acquired at par. In fact, it was the practice then, and, I believe, it will be in the knowledge of honourable Members, that people advanced money directly for a debenture bond from a railway company, and they were almost in the nature of personal securities not transferable in the market like debenture stock is now, but they were afterwards consolidated into debenture stocks, and these debenture stocks are now amongst the securities which are most sought after, and instead of representing 100*l.*, if they were to be sold to-day, they would represent, in some instances, 140*l.*, or more. As the Commissioners have had to sell these securities from time to time to satisfy the payments which they make to the widows, they have been able by the sale of a smaller portion of their property than was originally contemplated to satisfy their expenditure, and by these means this surplus has grown. There are other causes that have aided also.

508. It would be convenient if we turn now to your own statement given at page 22 of the report last issued; that is a statement of liabilities and assets to the 31st December, 1894; will you tell the Committee how you arrive at the data upon which that statement is prepared; may I take it you have had furnished to you and you have had access to all the materials which, as a skilled actuary, you felt it necessary to have to enable you to make the complete and reliable return required by the Commissioners?—I have had supplied to me from the office of the Commissioners all the information which I thought was requisite and desirable to make this valuation balance-sheet. For instance, the first item in the balance-sheet is 15,411*l.* a year, the total of the allowances that are in course of payment to 891 widows. I assess the amount of securities which should be in the hands of the Royal Commissioners to meet that particular liability at 143,750*l.* That is arrived at by my being furnished with a schedule from the office of the Commissioners giving me the various rates a week which all these 891 widows receive; that there are so many receiving 5*s.* 6*d.* a week, so many 6*s.* 6*d.* a week, and so on; and that each of these are of various ages, from 55 years of age to 88 years of age. For instance, that there are 72 widows of the age of 69 years. Then, in accordance with the practice of my profession, I calculate and assess, according to the probabilities of life, as to what will be the amount of money which would be required to provide this weekly allowance. I refer to the age of 69; there are there 72 widows; their weekly allowance is 22*l.* 9*s.*, and that is valued and set down, and the result of the calculation is brought into the balance-sheet with all the others. The other allowances are of a more complicated description. Some of the annuities have not yet become payable, and will not be payable till the women attain the age of 60 years; others until the women attain the age of 70 years; some are in the nature of funeral allowances, exactly in the same position as the contracts of an insurance company, payable on death. Then some items are more purely estimates; for instance, that the Royal Commissioners will in future continue certain subscriptions to hospitals, and grant allowances in sickness.

Chairman—continued.

509. What you have said so far refers to the widows only?—Yes. I am going down the list.

510. Before we leave the widows, may I not ask you if you take the personal history of each individual widow, and the scale of allowance which the Commissioners have determined to apply as far as their funds would allow, and that you make an independent actuarial estimate of the yearly sum necessary to enable them to satisfy those expectations, and the aggregate works out to the figure you have given here?—Yes. It is reported to me in the schedule which is prepared in the office of the Commissioners that such-and-such widows are now actually being paid, and will be paid, for the remainder of their lives an allowance which is mentioned in the schedule; then I am further informed that by a resolution of the Commissioners, when these women who are now below the age of 60 years attain the age of 60 years, they will be entitled to an increase of 2*s.* a week. That is valued.

511. At a certain age?—Yes, at a certain age; then I am further informed that, when these same widows reach the age of 70 years, their pension will be further increased by so much. That is also valued, and that is set down and all detailed, and each of these liabilities are separated. The value of each has to be assessed; that is to say, the amount of the securities which the Commissioners should be in possession of which may reasonably be expected to be sufficient to satisfy the claims of the widows as they arise.

512. You have to take, on the one hand, the calculation as to the probability or otherwise of the widows reaching the age of 70, and then allowing, if that age is attained, that there would be a higher weekly payment chargeable on the fund?—Quite so.

513. You accept the responsibility of putting down the aggregate liability of the fund to the 891 widows as 143,750*l.*?—Entirely so. That is my function in the matter.

514. Now, let us take the case of the widows who re-marry; are you furnished with information as to which of those widows have a modified allowance?—Yes, I have also that list given me. There are so many re-married women; there are altogether 429 of them. Then, in addition to calculating the value of the allowances actually payable to them, I make further calculations of the probability of their present husbands dying and of their returning to the fund, resuming the full rate of allowance, and a further calculation not only of the husbands dying, but of their then, after they have returned to the fund, attaining the increased ages and obtaining with the other widows the increased allowances. They are all detailed under separate heads in that balance-sheet to which reference has been made. For instance, there is "Provision for restoration to full allowances of 429 re-married women, 18,500*l.*" That is assessed, and then provision for the extra allowances to these 429 re-married women when they attain 60 and 70 years. That is assessed at 14,700*l.*

515. You have before you all the information which the Commissioners possess?—All the information which I ask for they supply to me.

516. The secretary stated that the policy of the Commissioners had been to grant out of increasing surpluses of assets increasing benefits to the widows, and specially to aged widows; you have not been consulted actuarially as to the policy and propriety of making those increased allowances?—I have not been consulted at all as to the propriety of making the allowances. Questions have been directed to me as to how much it would cost if the Commissioners did make those increased allowances, and how much liability they would entail if they did this or that; but I have never been consulted as to the propriety of their doing so. That has been entirely left in the hands of the Commissioners, as far as I know.

517. The Commissioners have sought your guidance in order to know whether the funds at their disposal would allow them to do it, and to what extent the funds might be encroached upon?—Doubtless they did that.

518. Is there anything further on the statement you have before you that you would like to say?—I might inform the Committee that there has been a change made in assessing the value of the assets in this balance-sheet.

519. Then we will now turn to the assets column?—The securities that are now in the hands of the Commissioners have been in their hands for many years. Since the conversion of Consols in 1888, as the Committee are aware, there has been a great rise in the value of all classes of trustee securities, and all these assets, I think, would come within that denomination. I have made for my own information, besides the valuations at the rate of interest of 4 per cent. given in former reports, other valuations which would discount the future liabilities of the Royal Commissioners at a lower rate of interest. That would increase the liability. The liabilities of the fund at the rate they were discounted at had reference to the price at which the securities were acquired. They are discounted and brought to present value according to the rate of interest which is stated to be used. In previous years that rate was 4 per cent. That would reduce the value of the liabilities, and show them on a lower scale than if a lower rate of interest is used.

520. May I, for example, call your attention to the fact that Consols are here given 3,975*l.* 11*s.* 4*d.* at 98?—Yes.

521. Working out to 3,896*l.*?—Yes.

522. That is not the value of those Consols to-day?—No. The value of Consols to-day is nearer 106; but there has been a very great rise in the price of Consols since this report was dated, but the price of Consols is a large subject.

523. Will you explain to the Committee why those are stated in this table of assets at a figure much below that which they would realise in the market on the date given?—Well, that is a small item in the securities, but that valuation might from one point of view be attacked because it is put so high. These liabilities are discounted at the rate of 2½ per cent., and some margin is wanted between the rate at which the securities are valued and the rate at which the liabilities are discounted. Consols in 1903 will only bring in 2*l.* 10*s.* a year for each 100*l.* of Consols, and it would be wrong from one point of view to value a security at a higher price than would correspond with the rate of interest which it was bringing in. If I go into the market to-day and buy some Consols at 106, and I bring into consideration the prospect of the Consols bearing only 2½ per cent. interest after the 5th of April, 1903, and that I shall be paid off at 100*l.*, possibly in 1923, when Consols become redeemable, the rate of interest I shall earn on them will be something not much more than 2½ per cent. Therefore, if I had valued Consols at 106, I ought, perhaps, to increase the amount of the corresponding liability by discounting the future liability at the rate of discount, also of 2*l.* 6*s.*

524. You are responsible for the particular figures at which these assets are placed?—Quite so.

525. Can you tell the Committee what is the income derivable from these assets which you value in the gross at 400,246*l.*?—There is a large amount of assets. The income can be roughly obtained by a reference to the separate income account of the Patriotic Fund that is contained in the same report. I do not think I have the particular paper, but that is one of the calculations which are made in relation to this, certainly.

526. Turn to page 28; the income is given at 14,032*l.*?—Presumably it is 14,000*l.*

527. Tell the Committee what percentage that represents?—£14,000 a year on about 400,000*l.* would be 3½ per cent.

528. Then you are satisfied in placing the assets at the capital value which is here given, seeing they yield 3½ per cent.?—Quite so.

529. And that you accept, from the actuarial point of view, as sound and sufficient?—Certainly. That is about the relative amount on which any commercial company—an insurance company, for instance—would value all their assets. According to the returns which are supplied to the Board of Trade and are published in a Parliamentary Paper, that is about the difference between the rates used for valuations and the rates of interest derived from the invested funds of insurance companies. They earn about 4 per cent., and they make valuations and discount their liabilities at 3½ per cent. in some instances, and 2½ per cent. in others. This valuation and these estimates for the Patriotic Fund are made on exactly the same lines as a commercial company would do.

530. In what you have said to us you have been referring to the Patriotic Fund proper only?—Entirely.

531. Is it your practice to prepare independent reports of the other funds administered by the Commissioners?—I have reported on the other funds from time to time at various dates.

532. I find

Chairman—continued.

532. I find, for instance, on the 6th of March last, you submitted a valuation of the assets and liabilities of the Victoria Relief Fund?—I think that is also in this report.

533. It is at page 25 of last year's report?—I valued the Victoria Fund according to the position in which it stood at the 31st December 1894.

534. With reference to the surpluses at the disposal of the Commissioners, do you regard those surpluses as having been obtained by a parsimonious expenditure of the funds, or would you say it is rather attributable to the prudential management of the Commissioners?—I thought we had left the Patriotic Fund. The surpluses on the other funds that are administered by the Royal Commissioners vary in amount very largely. Some of them are, comparatively speaking, very large, and some of them are relatively small. The growth of the Patriotic Fund is to be ascribed to several things. I am not aware how far the fund has been administered parsimoniously or otherwise.

535. I only recall your attention to the evidence, which probably you have seen, of Colonel Young, in which he tells us that from time to time there have been more generous rules laid down by the Commissioners. For example, the allowances to women on re-marrying and again becoming widows, and the allowances to widows attaining a particular age have been increased. Do you know anything which is a set-off against that in any way since you have taken any oversight of the accounts, or any way in which the allowances have been stinted or diminished?—I have noticed that many of the widows who are entitled to extra allowances at the age of 60 have not come forward to receive them. You will see here that the extra allowances actually in course of payment are made to 430 aged widows, and that there are altogether 891 of them. That would leave 460 widows. All of those widows have not attained the age of 60, but a great number of them have passed the age of 60, and do not appear to be in the receipt of that allowance. That has contributed to a certain extent to increase the surplus. I have only noticed that as a fact. I am not aware that there is any particular cause for it, or whether the women have not come forward to make their claims.

536. Are we to understand that women who have attained the age of 60 can continue to draw their allowance at the smaller rate after they have become entitled to an augmented allowance?—The accounts and schedules would show that that is the case. That is all that I know. Probably it may be only of a temporary nature before their claims are made out. For instance, many of the women have only recently passed the age of 60, and might not have come forward and made their claims. I do not know the cause of that.

537. Would you say they are entitled to claim and receive the arrears of any such increased allowance?—That I am not aware of. I have made provision amongst the liabilities for their receiving them.

538. Even though it may not have been claimed at the time that the accounts are made out?—For their receiving it in future; all those that are on the list who have not received it. I have not placed any item among the liabilities and investigated and gone back to the age of 60 to see what they would receive in the shape of arrears, but the secretary could give you better information on that point than I can.

Chairman—continued.

539. I do not quite know whether you mean to say that the assets are augmented by the fact of allowances which ought to have been paid, having accumulated in the hands of the Commissioners?—You will see that of the number of 891 widows, for instance, the allowances are actually in course of payment to 430 of them. That would leave 461 widows.

Commander Bethell.

540. One class is widows, and the other aged widows?—Yes.

Chairman.

541. In the report of 1891 there is a passage which says that the actuary has calculated that certain increases in the allowances would entail a liability of 64,125*l.*, which will reduce the surplus of assets over liabilities of the Patriotic Fund from 112,362*l.*, as it stood at the 31st December last, to 48,237*l.*?—Yes.

542. Those were advances in the liberal treatment of the recipients?—Certainly.

543. You have already stated that whenever any step of that kind was contemplated by the Commissioners you were asked to say what it would cost?—I have been constantly asked, and have reported as to what steps of that nature would cost; but whether I have been consulted on every occasion that the Commissioners have proposed to themselves to make an increase I am not aware; but I have been so consulted from time to time.

544. Do you recall any occasion on which you have been asked to advise the Commissioners as to how much the assets would be increased by any diminution in the scale of allowances?—No; never in my recollection since, perhaps, in 1881, when, perhaps, there might have been some such question, but not in recent years.

545. Eighteen hundred and eighty-one was a sort of turning point in the financial history, and in the soundness of the Commissioners' position; but from that time, whenever you have been consulted, you have been asked to advise as to what it would cost to augment the scale of allowances?—Yes.

546. You think it is possible that the assets of the Commissioners have been increased in spite of themselves, by the fact of widows and others not claiming the increased allowances which they were entitled?—I think that is possibly the cause. I believe they have actually not come forward to claim.

547. I suppose you are familiar with the fact that soldiers' effects are handed over to the administration of the Patriotic Fund?—Yes. I have on several occasions valued that fund.

548. That fund entirely arises, does it not, from the aggregation of sums to which the relatives of soldiers would have been entitled, but which have accumulated to the large amount they have reached in consequence of not being claimed at all?—That is so stated in the Preamble of the Regimental Debts Act, which provides for the destination of these funds.

549. I think, if you have nothing further to say with regard to the Patriotic Fund, I will call your attention to your report, which I have already referred to, on the assets and liabilities of the Victoria Fund; is there anything you would like to say to the Committee on that?—The thing I would trouble the Committee to allude to would be the last paragraph of the report in which I call attention to what is probably a small surplus balance of assets of 1,941*l.* only, but I add that I have valued the pensions to widows as if they would continue payable at the amount at which they were set down for the whole of their lives, while it has been the experience of the other funds that have been under the management of the Commissioners that widows of these youthful ages do marry to a large extent.

550. At the same rate?—Yes. It has been the experience of the other funds that have been under the management of the Commissioners that a large number of youthful widows generally do marry from about the second year to the fifth year of their widowhood, and that probably the fund will be relieved of a considerable amount of charge by those re-marriages.

551. So that the fund would be saved in the case of such by 50 per cent. in the event of their marrying?—There is probably a margin of security to the fund in that fact, that it is likely that a considerable proportion of these widows will re-marry and go to the half allowance. In fact, it is within general knowledge, though I do not suppose there is any actual proof of the fact, that the rate of re-marriage of these widows is increased above the ordinary rate at which other widows would re-marry, by the fact of their having this small allowance from the relief fund.

552. You think that the fact of a woman being able to retain half the allowance she has been receiving makes her a more desirable partner to a man with a limited income?—Quite so. I distinctly think so, and I think the fund eventually saves more by granting the half allowance than if the whole of the allowance ceased on re-marriage.

553. Have you been able to form any kind of actuarial estimate of the probabilities of re-marriage?—It depends very much upon the age of the widows, and it depends also to a very large extent upon the duration of the widowhood. It is more probable, for instance, that a widow who has only lost her husband for a couple of years, and is 33 years of age, will re-marry than a widow, also 33 years of age, who has lost her husband for 10 years. Most of the re-marriages of widows take place at about the interval I have indicated after the loss of their husbands. The rate of re-marriage not only depends upon age, but on the duration of widowhood. It is a complicated problem rather.

554. Is there anything you would like to say to the Committee with regard to the general treatment of the surpluses from the various funds which are administered by the Patriotic Fund Commissioners?—I do not think there is any information of value I could give to the Committee, because I have considered that that matter was one that did not come within my province. I have restricted myself to reporting to the Commissioners on the state of the funds and the amount of surpluses there were; but I have seldom gone to the extent, if ever, in my reports of advising or indicating any particular form of application of them.

555. With reference to the investment of the Commissioners' funds, was your attention called in any particular way to the necessity of prudence in consequence of the fall in colonial securities the year before last?—No; my attention was never called to it, but it had considerable influence on myself in postponing the change in the basis of the valuation of that fund, and in increasing the valuation of the securities generally, because a very large amount of colonial securities are held by the Patriotic Fund, and two or three years ago, as the Committee are aware, many of them were considered to be perhaps in a somewhat doubtful position. They are even now not thought to be the most eligible portion of the assets of the Royal Commissioners.

556. I do not know whether you would like to say anything with regard to the danger of taking the various fluctuations in the value of stocks and investments of that kind in estimating the resources of a permanent fund of this kind?—My own personal opinion is that that would be a very hazardous course to value the whole of these securities at the chance prices of every day. The basis that all prudent persons who are engaged in the management of analogous funds to this adopt is to take the valuation at which they may be supposed to remain over the whole currency of the contracts.

557. You dwelt in your last report on the Patriotic Fund upon some of those points, to which, I suppose, you would content yourself with calling attention?—It is a point which has been constantly in my mind. I do not at this moment recollect the particular paragraph to which you refer; but it would be doubtless not only found in that report, but probably in several others.

Mr. Kearley.

558. You have made a valuation yearly of the Patriotic Fund; of the main fund?—Yes, since 1882.

559. But not of every other fund every year?—No.

560. At certain intervals you have made valuations of the other funds; but that is not a yearly valuation?—No.

561. Now, if you were to aggregate the assets of the whole of the funds, simply dismissing the consideration of the name of the fund, and then aggregate the whole of the liabilities, would you be able to give us the probable aggregate surplus; I do not say at this moment, but could that be done?—It would be very desirable that valuations should be made altogether as at the same date for such a purpose.

562. Quite so; but I mean, taking the whole corpus, and considering the liabilities as against the

the capital fund, could you strike a balance and say what the detachable surplus would be?—I should hardly like to take the responsibility of doing that unless the valuations were made as at the same date. The circumstances change and several of the funds have not been valued since 1892.

563. I may assume that supposing you received instructions from the Patriotic Commissioners to do that, you could do it?—Certainly.

564. There would be no difficulty?—It would take time, that is all. There would be no difficulty in doing it at all.

565. Assuming there is an available surplus at the present moment, or after you had made this investigation, you would be able to reveal it on an actuarial and safe basis?—Yes.

566. You are in no way, I understood you to say, an adviser to the Patriotic Commissioners as to their methods and as to their investments. You simply have data supplied to you, and from that data you report?—That is so.

567. That is exactly your position?—Yes.

568. There was a reference made to what transpired in 1880. I think I understood you to say that the Patriotic Commissioners had a programme, and contemplated the erection of a sanatorium at the seaside and so on, and you said you did not assume that they had a contract liability in the same sense as an insurance company would have a contract liability; but that all their disbursements were subject to the funds permitting them being made on the bases they had laid down. Did I understand you correctly there?—That certainly is the general idea that I had.

569. You distinguish between the liability of a corporation such as an insurance company and the liability of the Patriotic Commissioners?—Decidedly.

570. Might I ask you (this perhaps is not quite a question that you should be called upon to answer), but as a matter of opinion have you always regarded the Patriotic Commissioners as trustees?—Certainly, for the administration of the particular funds.

571. And as such they would be governed to some extent, if not entirely, by the intention of the donors of these funds. Perhaps I may put it in another way: have you ever been a trustee yourself?—Yes.

572. Did you feel called upon always to administer the trust according to the intention of the person for whom you were administering it?—My view on that subject would be very strict indeed, entirely in accordance with the trust deed certainly; but may I say, I was going to reply to your question at first that it would be very difficult to ascertain, except general benevolent motives of patriotism, what was the idea of a donor to the Patriotic Fund that was raised at a time of enthusiasm in 1854 and 1855. My own idea on the subject was that it was left entirely to Her Majesty at that time to appoint by Her Commission distinguished persons who would administer the fund in the best possible manner.

573. Now, with reference to your report on page 22 of the 33rd Report, I think I may say at the outset we are all prepared to accept your estimates, and fully recognise the necessity of caution in the exercise of your very responsible duties, but I should like to have on record your confirmation of the following questions I am going to put to you. Taking first the credit side of the account, do I understand that in valuing the several securities you did not feel justified in writing them up to their present market values?—That is so. I consider that the present market value of all securities of the class that these are is very high indeed, and that many eventualities may arise, both from a financial point of view and from a political point of view, which would very greatly depreciate their value.

574. You have taken medium prices?—I have taken medium prices which I think may safely be assumed to last during the currency of these particular engagements.

575. That would be in conformity with the practice of the best actuaries, I presume?—That I certainly presume.

576. I noticed that you were rather timorous as to what would be the price of consols in 1903, and you have taken that into your consideration?—Yes.

577. Would it be fair to ask you whether that would not cut both ways? Take, for instance, Great Western stock. Would Great Western stock in 1903 be subject to the same possible diminution, or would it not be within the bounds of possibility that an enhancement in the value would take place?—The Great Western stock is a permanent stock, and there is a growing inclination on the part of trustees to invest in far more hazardous securities than the permanent debenture stock of the Great Western. In fact, these securities are not to be obtained now in the market without paying very high prices for them, and that led me to think that the prices I put on these debentures and stocks were safe prices and would last.

578. There can be no question in your mind that the amount you have taken credit for will certainly be realised?—There is no question whatever in my mind that the prices at which I have placed these securities will certainly be realised when they are required.

579. They perhaps may realise a little more?—I hope so.

580. There is, at any rate, a margin?—There is a margin certainly.

581. I see you valued liabilities on a 2½ per cent. basis?—That is so.

582. But the capital you realised at 3½ per cent.?—That is a margin on the side of security.

583. Then there are two margins on the credit side?—Yes, there is a margin with reference to income and a margin with reference to the prices that I think the capital will realise when it is also required.

584. First, the possible greater capital yield of the investments; second, the yearly excess of interest obtained over that assumed about one per cent. per annum upon the present capital. Yes. That is following the course which is pursued by prosperous insurance companies when they make valuations for the purpose of increasing the bonuses on their polices, and of paying a dividend

to their shareholders, rather than the course that might be taken by an institution which is not prosperous when it may be making a valuation, for the sake of proving to the Court of Chancery or Bankruptcy that it is able to meet its engagements. Then the valuation might be made up to the hilt, and perhaps an actuary would assume the highest rate of interest that could be allowed in diminishing the value of the liabilities.

585. So much for the assets; now with reference to the liabilities. In reserving for the value of the annuities in possession you have employed a safe rate of mortality; that is to say, one probably rather better than will eventuate?—With regard to that, every year in the reports I have, at the request of the Commissioners, given an estimate of the number of deaths that are likely to occur according to the standard used, and for many years that has corresponded closely with my estimates. For instance, between 1885 and 1889, taking those five years together, I estimated that 324 deaths would take place. The actual number of deaths that occurred amongst widows and re-married women were 322, but since that time the death-rate amongst the widows seems to have increased. Whether that was owing to temporary causes I cannot say; but it is within the knowledge of all Members of the Committee that influenza has been prevalent, and we have had hard winters, and so on, and that may have caused the change; but the estimates that were made for the years 1890 to 1894 pointed to 287 deaths; and instead of that no less than 367 deaths have occurred amongst the widows, a very large difference.

586. What did you estimate when the 367 widows died?—I estimated that not more than 287 would die, but 367 did die; the difference occurred very greatly in one year, namely, the year 1892. I estimated then that 56 widows only would die, instead of which the large proportionate number of 90 widows died; but I am informed by the secretary that about that time much greater precautions had been taken with regard to the identity of many of the widows that came forward as claimants; that much stricter identification of the widows, or that some change took place in the forms under which they claimed the allowances. He is of opinion, I believe, that the increase in the number of apparent deaths may be owing in some degree to that; that possibly there were a certain number of claimants who ought not to have come forward.

587. But independently of little irregularities of judgment, if I may use the expression, at all events the rate of mortality assumed is abundantly safe in your estimation?—As far as these last five years are concerned, decidedly so. As far as regards the preceding five years, I hardly think there was abundant safety. I think it was very close to the mark when I estimated that during five years 324 widows would die, and 322 only did die. It is very close to the mark, and in fact only two over, but certainly the estimate was then that more annuitants would die than actually did die.

588. Taking the funds as they are at this moment, may I assume that the rate of mortality you have assumed is abundantly safe?—I hope that it is so.

589. In like manner there are certain annuities liable to suspension on recoverture; you have treated them as indefeasible, and if that be so this in itself would tend to supply a protecting margin?—Well, I do not know; these widows unfortunately lost their original husbands 41 years ago; they are of the average age of about 68 years. I do not think there is much chance of the fund gaining much from the re-marriage of widows of the average age of 68 years. I do not contemplate the fund will have any considerable saving on this account. The youngest woman on the widows' list is 55 years of age, but out of 891 there are only 579 under the age of 70 years. They are all elderly women. I think there is a very small probability, and I have not estimated that any of them will re-marry.

590. You do not think the reserve on that account is worth considering?—No; but on the contrary, with regard to the Victoria Fund, I think there is a material margin of safety there. There the widows are not only young, but recently widowed. I think there is a probability of a large proportion of them marrying.

591. If I had addressed that question to you à propos of the Victoria Fund, you would have agreed with the view that there would be a large protecting margin?—Yes.

592. But owing to the ages of the widows on the Main Patriotic Fund there is no margin that is assured as likely to be realised in that particular direction?—No.

593. In your account you have made provision, I presume, for all the extra allowances and for restoration of certain pensioners to full allowances?—Yes.

594. And we may take this as being ample?—I hope so.

595. You have made sufficient provision, distinctly set out, as I see here, for the working expenses?—Yes.

596. And may I take it that you expect that the amount reserved will be sufficient to cover the outlay on that head without trenching on any other resources?—Yes. I may say that, generally speaking, taking the whole of the account, I have put down a liability for everything I could ascertain or conjecture.

597. You have endeavoured to protect all your calculations on both sides of the account; you have exercised the further caution of adding a final and not specifically approximate reserve of 6,000*l.* by way of general margin?—Yes. I may say that that particular figure and that particular reserve has been made at the express desire of the Commissioners that I would include such a reserve.

598. The contingent reserve?—For contingencies. I presume it is to meet the case of claimants who are unknown, or who are abroad, or something of that kind, and who may come forward. I believe that is the design of that particular reserve, but I have been requested to make a reserve for contingencies of 6,000*l.*, and I have made that precise reserve over and above the margin which I have taken myself.

599. Including that may we say the gross liabilities

Mr. Kearley—continued.

liabilities as estimated and shown by you are fully measured?—That has been my object in drawing the balance-sheet.

600. And contain all proper and sufficient margins against unforeseen contingencies and fluctuations?—Yes.

601. Might I ask you as to whether you could give your opinion as to the price any insurance company would be willing to undertake the liabilities of the fund for? I suggest a figure of 394,000*l.*?—I think many insurance companies would be very glad if those particular assets were handed over to them to give the utmost consideration to it as a commercial speculation, and take the fund over on very favourable terms. It would be highly advantageous to an insurance company in the present scarcity of investments to obtain these securities.

602. The surplus you show for this fund is 74,136*l.*?—Yes.

603. And in view of the question I put to you, we may take it that the surplus shown in the account is a real surplus?—Yes.

604. That it represents monies over and above the actual needs of the fund in respect of the present incumbents?—Yes.

605. I believe that you have had to advise assurance companies as to their financial position from time to time?—I have advised many institutions and many funds but I have not been connected with any assurance company.

606. You have had references made to you probably?—I have considered their accounts. I am acquainted with the subject generally.

607. I suppose the reference has been made to you at times as to whether they have possessed any surplus assets?—I am conversant with that subject and have examined particularly the accounts of a society in which I am personally interested, in fact where my own life is insured.

608. We may take this valuation as being very strictly made?—Yes, certainly.

609. With a full series of protecting margins?—Yes.

610. Do you consider that the surplus shown by you could, without detriment to any existing interest, or without imperilling the stability of any allowance now granted, be applied either in enlarging those now payable or by bringing in additional beneficiaries?—I think that was the very object of the valuation, and that is to show the surplus balance which would be at the disposal of the Royal Commissioners if they choose to appropriate it to any object which was within the regulations they have laid down.

611. There is a detachable surplus asset in this particular fund?—That is so.

612. Would all these questions, or the bulk of them, I have put to you apply to all the other funds. There are some funds with no visible surplus assets worth considering, but on the other hand there are many of the funds that have large surplus assets?—Yes.

613. Then coming back to the question I asked at the commencement, if you could aggregate the assets and liabilities and strike a balance, and tell us what was the aggregate surplus assets of the whole of these monies, would it amount almost to a quarter of a million of money?—If they were all brought to a point, but I presume you are aware, as you have made reference to the terms of the trust deeds and so on, that the object of all these funds and the way they should be employed would vary. The addition sum certainly could be made, but it would be desirable if that was the case that every fund should be valued on the same basis and on the same date.

Commander Bethell.

614. Would it be possible to do what the honourable Member suggests, having in view the fact that the trusts may vary in their terms naturally?—It would be possible to find the surplus of the funds and add them together and aggregate them, and say there was a certain total surplus. They would be heterogeneous items, but there are other funds in existence which are applied to the same purposes, not under the management of the Patriotic Fund Commissioners.

Mr. Kearley.

615. Both things could be done I take it; put the whole thing into hotchpotch and assume uniformity of liability, and take the things separately according to the trust deed, and strike a balance of each particular fund according to the conditions of the trust?—Of course you could take in an analogous way every insurance company in the kingdom, and add together all their liabilities and their surpluses, but many are in different positions, and I do not know that any useful result would be obtained. Those additions are made at the end of the Blue Book which contains all the accounts of the insurance companies. They are used for statistical purposes.

616. With reference to page 18 of the 33rd Report, it would appear that for the first time you have made a different valuation to the preceding reports in estimating the liabilities at 2½ per cent.?—That is so.

617. Is not that rather a more stringent course than any life insurance company has hitherto taken?—No, there are several insurance companies who since the recent rise in the price of securities have adopted that course, and there are many others who are trying to attain it by setting aside a special reserve among their liabilities in order that they may value at this lower rate of interest in future.

618. It is a very safe way of valuing?—Yes, it is a very safe way of valuing. There are many of the richer insurauce companies who already value their liabilities at 2½ per cent., and those who are able to do so are looked upon with envy by the rival societies who are not yet in a position to do that.

619. I am told that out of 80 great insurance companies only three of them have assumed the 2½ per cent. basis?—I think that many more will quickly follow.

620. I am not questioning the policy of doing it; I quite agree it is a good policy?—And nearly all companies that can afford it; that is to

to say, that have a surplus of assets sufficient to do it will do so.

621. The Chairman asked you as to whether the surplus arose from not applying the resources towards pensions; would it not be correct to say it necessarily must arise from that procedure?—Yes.

622. The surplus can only arise from that method of not applying the resources towards pensions?—The increase of the surplus can only arise from some such cause. The surplus is considerable. In the first place the surplus would increase itself by being brought forward from the past years, and from interest accruing on it. That would be one cause of the increase of the surplus. Another cause of the increase of the surplus would be the margin between the rate of interest assumed in the valuation and the rate actually earned on the securities. That would be another cause of increase. A third cause of increase such as the honourable Member alludes to would be from some liability that was estimated for on the balance-sheet not arising. That is to say in the nature of some period of deferment taking place in the time when the aged women come forward to claim their pensions.

Mr. Seale-Hayne.

623. At page 12 you have a statement of the balances on Stock Accounts on the 31st December 1894. Those appear to be a mere statement of the face value of the various Stocks. Is that so?—That is so. That is signed by the Assistant Paymaster-General as a statement of the securities.

624. I have his statement of the securities to a later date, but this is the face value of these various securities on the 31st December 1894?—That is what the account purports to be.

625. It is so?—It is so.

626. Now at page 22 you give the liabilities and assets of the Patriotic Fund, and there you give the face values and the valuation per cent. according to your estimate?—Yes.

627. You do that in regard to the Patriotic Fund; why is it not done with reference to all the other funds?—I beg the honourable Member's pardon; I think it is done.

628. It is done with reference to the "Victoria" Fund and one or two others, but there are others in which the face value alone appears?—I am not aware of the particular account.

629. I will take one?—The auditor is responsible for the whole statement of securities; my province is confined to the valuation of the various funds, and I think if the right honourable gentleman will refer to each of the valuations he will find that the same course of procedure has been followed, and that my estimate has been placed on the value of the securities of everyone of the funds.

630. Show me where the valuation occurs of other funds than the Patriotic Fund?—They would occur in previous reports to the Commissioners. In this current report there is only the Patriotic Fund and the Victoria Fund. The 31st December 1893, was the last date at which the valuation was made of the Soldiers' Effects Fund; the "Captain" Fund was valued on the 31st

Mr. Seale-Hayne—continued.

December 1892; the "Eurydice" Fund on the 31st December 1892.

631. In point of fact, we have got no valuation of those funds in the present report; what I want to arrive at is the present actual value if possible; I understand we have the value of certain funds, but not of others up to the present time?—Not in the current report of the Commissioners. I am giving you a list of the dates upon which I was last asked to make a valuation of the other funds. The Zulu War Fund was also valued at the same date; the "Atalanta" at the same date, the 31st December 1892, and the Ashantee War Fund as well. In that same report there was hardly a valuation, but there was a report stating the number of annuities which would be given out of a small fund called the Light Brigade Fund, the survivors of Balaclava.

632. That is all perfectly clear, but I am correct in stating that with the exception of this "Victoria" Fund we have not any report before us of the present values of all the securities according to your estimate?—In one current report, I presume, there would not be the whole of them. These have been valued on other occasions.

633. Is it so or not so that there is no valuation before us of the securities at the 31st December last?—I presume not, but it does not fall within my province to examine these statements of accounts in any way whatever.

634. You understand I am finding no fault with you, but I only want the fact. Is it so or not?—Not so to my knowledge, but I am not conversant with the whole of the accounts in this report. I am only conversant with the report that I have made. I am not in the position of an officer of the Royal Commissioners at all.

Mr. Mowbray.

635. I understand that during the last three years you have made a valuation of every one of these smaller funds?—As far as my knowledge goes. I have made a valuation within the last three years of every one of the funds, but the secretary could inform you better than I whether by chance I have not been consulted with regard to any fund under the management of the Royal Commission.

Captain Norton (to Colonel Young).] Could we not have a statement of all of these funds up to date. Could they not all be valued on the same basis as the Royal Patriotic Fund.

Colonel Young.] There would be no difficulty at all. The only reason why they are not valued yearly is that it costs so much money and brings no result, and the fund is saved that cost and it is thought every three years is sufficient; but if it is the wish of the Committee, the details can be furnished at any time to Mr. Finlaison, to get it up to the 31st December 1894.

Mr. Seale-Hayne.

636. I only want to ascertain the facts?—May, I say one thing in order that the Committee may not be under a misapprehension. Colonel Young has very properly alluded to the cost of these these valuations. The cost I do not think is at all on a high scale. If I may be allowed to say so, the view of both my father and myself always was that the cost of these examinations to ourselves very closely approximated to the amount of the honorarium which we received from the Royal Commissioners. In the case of the large fund, which involves a large number of calculations and a large amount of details and the verification of many figures, the fee has always, from the commencement, been 25 guineas, and the fee I have charged for the valuation of the smaller funds has been a nominal fee of five guineas.

Mr. Seale-Hayne—continued.

Mr. Woodall.

WILLIAM WOODALL, Esq., IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. ALEXANDER JOHN FINLAISON, C.B., re-called; and further Examined.

Mr. Seale-Hayne.

637. I THINK I understood you to say that you valued some of these securities, having regard to the income and the annual charges upon the fund?—Quite so.

638. That being so, would not the result be that some of the securities bearing a low rate of interest, such as consols, which are valuable, would be less highly valued than some of those securities bearing a higher rate of interest, and which presumably were not of the same category?—That would be so; they would be less highly valued in comparison with their market price.

639. Will you take the 33rd Report, and turn to pages 36 and 37?—Yes, that is the Royal Naval Relief Fund. It is prepared in the office of the Commissioners, and it is audited by the Treasury auditor. It would be used by me to bring forward into the valuation balance-sheet; but it is in no sense prepared by me.

640. I did not say it was, but I was going to call your attention to a question which has reference to valuation, in order to illustrate what you have just said. You will find on the payment side of that account a sum of 6,956*l.* 13*s.* 2*d.*, which is the face value of "Queensland 4 per cent. inscribed stock"?—Yes, it is so stated.

641. On the other side of the account you find an entry of the sale of that stock for 7,165*l.* 6*s.* 2*d.*?—Yes.

642. Showing, in round numbers, about 200*l.* gain on the sale of that stock?—Yes, that is so.

643. Is not that a very small margin of difference between the two, because you have valued the consols at 98*l.*, and of course a similar sale would have realised a larger sum. It seems to me that that is sailing a little near the wind?—May I turn to the last examination which I made of the Royal Naval Relief Fund?

644. Pray do. I have taken your valuation of the Queensland stock at 100*l.* You will find at page 22, in your valuation of the assets of the Patriotic Fund, that you put those down at 100*l.*?—That would be so, I think.

Mr. Seale-Hayne—continued.

645. And you put down consols at 98?—Yes, that is so.

646. You are not responsible, you say, for the valuation, but it strikes me that that is an instance, one out of many which might be selected, in which the valuation of such a stock as the Queensland stock is rather high as compared with the valuation put upon consols?—Quite so, but of course there is one thing to be noticed, that the Queensland stock is bearing a higher rate of interest in relation to its nominal value.

647. With reference to your valuation, in your opinion is every individual fund solvent, having regard to the charges it will have to bear?—Every one; some of them have a much larger margin of solvency than others.

648. Are there others which have a surplus of solvency if they were wound up?—Yes.

649. Could you name the ones which have a surplus?—These surpluses would rather have reference to different dates; that is to say, to the time at which the examinations into the respective funds was made. The surplus on the Patriotic Fund at the date of the last valuation, which was the 31st of December last, was 74,136*l.* The Victoria Fund, on the 31st December 1894, was estimated also to have a surplus of 1,941*l.*, and the Soldiers' Effects Fund, on the 31st December 1893 ——

Mr. Kearley.

650. The date that the last valuation was made?—The date at the time the last valuation was made, it was estimated to have a surplus of 100,334*l.*; the "Captain" Fund, on the 31st December 1892, 11,383*l*; the "Eurydice" Fund, on the 31st December 1892, 4,088*l.*; the Zulu War Fund, on the 31st December 1892, 12,598*l.*; the "Atalanta" Fund, on the 31st December 1892, 2,242*l.*; "Ashantee War" Fund, on the 31st December 1892, 606*l.* That is the list of the funds so far as I am aware.

651. What about the "Zervudachi" Fund and the "Rodriguez" Fund?—I have not been consulted with regard to those.

652. Can

Mr. Seale-Hayne.

652. Can you tell us now as to those which are not enumerated in that list?—No, I can give no information with regard to those. I can only give information with regard to the funds upon which I have been consulted.

653. Then in regard to the funds upon which you have been consulted, have you totalled up the surpluses?—Yes. The surpluses altogether would be 207,328*l.*; but, of course, the right honourable Member is aware that the funds are all devoted to separate purposes, some of them very dissimilar to others.

Mr. Seale-Hayne.] I am quite aware of that.

Chairman.

654. When were you last called upon to value the assets of the Patriotic Fund?—On the 31st of December last.

655. But are there certain funds which do not come into your cognisance, and about which there is no report in your valuation?—There is no report of mine naturally on any funds that I have not been consulted upon.

Mr. Seale-Hayne.

656. But you valued the assets of the Patriotic Fund as lately as December 1894?—December 1894; the account was brought up to the 31st of December.

657. Are you responsible for the figures given in by Colonel Young in his evidence-in-chief 342,910*l.* 17*s.* 2*d.*?—I will refer to the copy of my report which is in the last Report of the Commissioners. To what did that particular figure refer?

658. That was stated to us as being the amount of the capital account, the capital standing to the credit of the Patriotic Fund proper at the close of the last year (the witness referred)?—According to the valuation on the balance sheet of my report, the value of the assets, inclusive of the cash in the office and the dividends that had accrued up to that date, was 400,246*l.* That is my estimate of their value in money as on that date. With regard to these face values the sum is not made; but the sum of the face values agrees with the amount sent to me as signed by the auditor. The face values are mentioned, but I have not totalled them as they are hardly analogous. There are 4 per cent. stocks and 4½ per cent. stocks, and 3½ per cent. stocks, and 2¾ per cent. stocks, and I have not added them together because they are of different natures; it would be adding incongruous things together.

659. £342,910 17*s.* 2*d.* is the amount at which the capital account is said to stand on the 31st of December 1894, which represents the nominal face values?—Quite so.

660. The actual valuation put upon those is what?—You must exclude 6,192*l.* for accrued dividends, if you will allow me just to make that little note. (The Witness made a calculation.) It would be 394,054*l.*

661. But, including the dividends that had accrued at that time and cash in the office, the amount for which you are responsible stands at 400,246*l.*?—Quite so.

662. As stated on page 22 of the last report?—That is so.

Mr. Kearley.

663. In the statement of the assets of the "Victoria" Fund you have "Manchester Ship Canal Debentures"?—Yes.

664. How have you treated that; what sort of valuation have you put upon that?—Those have been valued at 102.

665. They are slightly above par?—Yes, slightly above par; they were purchased very recently slightly above par.

666. They are actuarily considered a good investment, are they?—The Manchester Ship Canal is hardly established yet, and its securities were purchased by the Royal Commissioners, acting, I presume, under the advice of their sub-committee; and there are several distinguished financial authorities on the committee.

667. I am only asking your general opinion as to whether you think those shares are likely to maintain their price in the market?—My professional opinion. The valuation which I have placed upon them is supported both by the price at which those particular debentures were obtained by the Royal Commissioners, acting, I believe, on the very highest advice, and it was also maintained by the price in the "London Daily Stock and Share List," issued by the authority of the Stock Exchange Committee on the date when I made that valuation, which was on the 6th of March last. Since then, we have had the advantage of some subsequent reports and history of the Manchester Ship Canal; but at the date at which I made that valuation this price was fully supported by the price quoted in the public Stock and Share List.

668. I suppose the investment is a very good one indeed?—I think the bulk of the investments throughout the whole of the funds are most excellent investments.

669. I will call your attention to page 7 of the last report, paragraph 4: "with reference to this large surplus of assets 74,136*l.*, we have ameliorated the conditions under which the special old age allowances to widows of 60 years of age and upwards are issued," and so on. I wish to ask you whether the amelioration there said to have taken place had taken place prior to this estimate, or whether they will reduce it, not having been taken into consideration prior to it?—The Report of the Royal Commission is dated the 9th of April 1895. My report on the Patriotic Fund was dated the 27th of February; therefore that statement in the report of the Royal Commissioners would be subsequent to the date of my examination and valuation.

670. Then that 74,000*l.* odd would have to be subjected to this amelioration?—Yes, quite so.

671. £74,000 odd presents itself to you as a certain asset, having regard to the conditions and liabilities as they were at the time when you struck struck the balance?—Yes, at the 31st of December 1894.

672. Something was contemplated of which you, as an accountant, have had so far taken no cognizance?—That was so not at that date.

673. If you were requested by the Committee could you furnish us with a statement showing the available aggregate surplus assets of the whole of the funds dealt with by the Patriotic Fund Commissioners? ——

Chairman.

674. I take it that if you were called upon to furnish such a statement as that suggested by the honourable Member, you would have no objection to do it?—No.

Mr. WILLIAM TAYLOR, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

675. YOU hold an important position in the office of the Commissioners of the National Debt?—I hold the post of Assistant Comptroller in the National Debt Office.

676. How long have you held that position?—For the last six months.

677. But you have had much longer service than that in the office?—Yes, I have been upwards of 40 years in the office. I was chief clerk before that.

678. May we take it that you have an intimate experience of accounts and the work relating thereto?—Yes.

679. You have audited the accounts of the Patriotic Fund Commissioners, have you not?—During the five years 1888 to 1892 inclusive.

680. But you have no such responsibility at the present time?—No.

681. You have been succeeded by Mr. Tripp?—Yes, by Mr. Tripp.

682. From what source or authority did you derive your appointment as auditor?—From the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury.

683. Then, acting on the appointment received from the Treasury, your position has been entirely independent of anything like bias or control by the Commissioners?—Quite so; I am not in any way the servant of the Patriotic Fund Commissioners.

684. The Treasury appointed you under the authority of an Act of Parliament?—Under the authority of an Act of Parliament.

685. What Act was that?—The 30th and 31st Vict. c. 98, Sec. 17; it is the Act of 1867.

686. We may take it, without pressing the matter further, that your duty as auditor was in the discharge of the public service, as indicated by the Act of Parliament referred to?—Quite so.

687. Will you describe to the Committee the general method you adopted in preparing the audit; were certain accounts submitted to you at the end of the year, for example, or did you have concurrent observations?—For the first time my audit was a concurrent one. The former auditors audited the accounts once in every twelve months, but I believe at the instance of the present secretary concurrent audit was very strongly pressed, and it was the only successful way of carrying on that audit.

688. Then are we to understand that, not at any particular period during the year, but continuously throughout the year you had the accounts under your supervision?—Yes, during the whole year through; I went in just when it was convenient.

689. When did that practice commence?—In 1888 for the first time.

690. And it was continued by you till 1892?—Throughout the period of my audit.

691. Then do I understand that before you began the practice in 1888 the concurrent process was not pursued?—No, it was not.

692. Would you mind giving the Committee some idea of the advantage which you think would attach to that system of continuous audit?—At the time that I took up the audit there were many slight discrepancies, and it would have been impossible to follow them out and to rectify them if I had waited till the end of the year. It facilitated the work very much to rectify any little casual errors that may have occurred as we went along.

693. Errors in account keeping, do you mean?—Not necessarily in account keeping, but in connection with the payment of allowances to the recipients of the bounty; differences in names and errors of almost every description in connection with the life certificates. You see, the payments were made quarterly to the recipients, and if there were any mistake in one quarter, it would follow on perhaps, to the two or three next quarters of the year, unless it were attended to at once; and if it was in the first quarter it would not be found out until the end of the year.

694. You are speaking of payments which had undoubtedly been made, but unjustly made to those people?—Not necessarily unjustly; there were some names struck off the funds during the period of my audit, and of course, if the query had not been attended to till the end of the year, they might have had two or three payments more than they actually did.

695. Then was your audit more searching and thorough than the ordinary professional audit of which the accounts of a public company, for instance, would be subjected to?—I should think I went very much deeper into the accounts than a public accountant would, partly on account of my official position, as I considered it necessary that I should maintain my reputation in carrying out that audit, and I went very deeply into it.

696. Then the work of the auditor on your method was more heavy and serious than the ordinary process?—It was a very heavy work.

697. Are you able to express any opinion as to the manner in which the accounts of the Patriotic Fund are kept?—Generally, I should think think that they are kept in a very satisfactory manner.

698. Accurately and efficiently?—Quite so; thoroughly.

699. Now, turning to your experience in the National Debt Office, you must have had a great deal of knowledge with regard to the system of payment of annuities?—Yes.

700. Can you tell the Committee from your experience whether the machinery in connection with the payment of allowances to the widows and orphans by the Patriotic Fund Commissioners is in your opinion efficient?—I should say it was thoroughly efficient now; it is in a much better position now than it was six or seven years ago. Many improvements have taken place during the last seven years, which have rendered the evidence of the existence of the recipients of the bounty exceedingly good.

701. Have those improvements been made at your suggestion?—No, I do not think so. I can hardly say that any of them have been made at my suggestion. I think that mostly they were initiated by the secretary.

702. But I suppose you found a disposition to accept any suggestions you might make with a view of rendering the accounts more accurate?—Yes, I always found the secretary most ready to adopt any suggestion.

703. In fact, you got every assistance from the secretary to the Commissioners in the conduct of your work?—Yes, the fullest assistance.

704. Have you anything further you would like to state to the Committee arising out of your experience?—I think that the executive work seems to be so thoroughly well looked after now that I hardly know that I could add anything that would be of use in that way.

Mr. Kearley.

705. The executive work, you say?—Yes; I meant in relation to keeping the books and all the payments in connection with the allowances.

706. That would apply to the accounts, the book-keeping, and so on?—Yes.

707. You are not in a position to express any opinion as to the efficacy of the executive administration of these funds?—I have never had any authority over the administration.

Mr. Bayley.

708. In 1892 you did not sign the accounts in the ordinary way?—In 1892, in my Report on the Patriotic Fund Account, I made a note, "subject to observations in Special Report." That, I think, had relation to the question of salaries. The proper authority under the Royal Sign Manual was not before me, and I had reported upon the absence of that authority in previous years.

709. And then in the Report presented in 1894, at page 31, your successor reported that "The Royal Warrant regulating the office establishment, to which reference was made in my predecessor's Report for 1892, has been received, and the salaries paid to the staff can now be certified as having been duly authorised." So that the practice had been altered?—Yes; the proper authority had been received for the salaries. At page 17 of the Report in 1893, in the final paragraph of my last Report, I stated that we were only waiting for the Royal Sign Manual to be affixed to a scale of salaries which have been fixed by the Royal Commissioners. I rather delayed my Report in the hope that the Royal Sign Manual might be given before I quitted office.

710. There was nothing wrong in the accounts that made you hesitate to sign the accounts?—No.

Mr. GEORGE H. TRIPP, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

711. THE accounts which are before the Committee for the last year are signed and certified by you?—That is so.

712. Am I right in supposing that you are the clerk in charge of accounts in the Home Office?—Yes.

713. And that you have had extensive experience in the matter of account-keeping?—My experience in the Home Office extends over a period of 17 years. For three years of that period I was assistant accountant, and for the last eight I have been accountant to the Home Office.

714. In a professional sense, outside your duties at the Home Office, you have been a teacher of account-keeping, have you not?—Yes, that was so; at one time I lectured on book-keeping at King's College.

715. You have heard the evidence of your predecessor, Mr. Taylor, from which we have gathered how he was appointed, and in what sense he has discharged his duties in the public interest and without any kind of control from the Commissioners of the Patriotic Fund?—Yes.

716. May I take it that you would explain your own position in much the same terms?—Yes; the appointment is made by the Treasury, absolutely unsolicited in my case. Lord Welby, when asking me to accept it, was good enough to say that the principle on which the Treasury proceeded was to entrust the audit of this and kindred accounts to those gentlemen who had given satisfactory proof in the management of their own accounts that they were competent to undertake the duty.

717. For how many years have you audited the accounts of the Patriotic Fund Commission?—I am now engaged in the third year of audit, and have reported on two occasions.

718. You reported on the accounts for 1893 and 1894?—Yes.

719. And have you found those accounts accurately and efficiently kept?—Quite.

720. Are they generally up to date, or are they sometimes in arrear?—No, they are invariably variably up to date; and, if I might be allowed to say so, I think that the system and whole organisation of that portion of the work that comes under my review is very efficient.

721. Do you know anything of the machinery, or have you made it your business to inform yourself as to the machinery, for making the payments to widows and orphans; and do you consider that efficient?—Yes, the system corresponds substantially, I believe, with that adopted by the War Office and the Admiralty for the payment of pensioners, and by ourselves at the Home Office for the payment of pensioners from the Metropolitan Police Force.

722. Are you aware of the fact that at one time the payments were actually made for the Patriotic Fund Commissioners by the War Office?—Yes.

723. And, generally speaking, in your experience the system of the War Office has been followed by the Commissioners in making their payments?—Yes.

724. I take it from what you have said that you have always been afforded the fullest facilities by the Commissioners in carrying out your independent audit of their accounts?—The fullest and the utmost readiness has been shown to accept any suggestions on matters of detail which might be made by the auditor in the course of the audit.

725. Do you follow the method that your predecessor has described of what he called a concurrent audit?—Yes, I am engaged at the present time in auditing the accounts for the month of March, whereas, as accountant for the Home Office, I have not rendered to the Auditor General my own accounts for that month; therefore, the audit of the Patriotic Fund is in advance of the Auditor General's, so far as the Home Office is concerned.

726. I do not want to take you over the same ground as Mr. Taylor has covered, but may I take it that you agree with his evidence, or is there any point of what he stated on which you would like to make any observations?—No; I am in full agreement with all that Mr. Taylor has stated.

727. Have you any further observation that you would like to make to the Committee?—I think not, unless, perhaps, it might be useful to point out that in addition to forwarding the report on the accounts of the fund for the year to the Secretary of the Royal Commission for presentation to Her Majesty and to Parliament, a copy of the report is sent by me to the Treasury, and thus the Treasury is apprised at the close of each year of any circumstances which have come under my notice as auditor.

728. Are you brought into any kind of relationship with Mr. Finlaison, when he is commissioned to make a special actuarial report?—No.

729. Your duties are quite independent of those which from time to time the actuary discharges when he has to make a report?—Yes, entirely.

Commander Bethell.

730. You have nothing at all to do with valuing the various funds?—No, my province is to see that the capital of the funds is properly invested; that the proceeds of the sale or redemption of stock are brought to account; and to verify the balances of the stocks shown in the books of the Commissioners at the close of the year.

731. You have some responsibility in connection with the investment of the funds?—Certainly; but merely to see that an investment is duly made, and in the case of those funds which are regulated by trust deeds, that the investment is made in securities authorised by law for trustees.

732. That is to say, you have no responsibility as to the way in which the money is invested, provided in the case of trust funds it is invested in the terms of the trust, and provided that in the other case it is invested?—No, no responsibility beyond that; wide discretionary powers are conferred upon the Commissioners in regard to investments.

Mr. Kearley.

733. Will you turn to page 14 of the Report of last year; you report there as to certain sums realising 71,000*l.* odd; do you happen to know what the purchase value of that stock was, the original purchase value; I am alluding to paragraph 2 of your Report?—No, I should only see in the books of the Commissioners which come under my notice the nominal value of the stock. Possibly the records of the Commission may be sufficiently complete to enable the secretary to trace the original cost.

Commander Bethell.

734. I did not remember when I was examining you that at page 15 of this last Report signed by you, at paragraphs 5 and 6, there is a statement that "the investment of money belonging to this ('Captain') fund in Metropolitan Consolidated Stock does not appear to be authorised by the terms of the trust deed under which the fund is administered. A similar remark applies to the Eurydice Fund"?—That is so; you will see a note appended by the secretary to the effect that a transfer has been made.

735. They have been removed, you mean?—Yes, they have been invested in other securities.

Mr. Bayley.

736. The trustees, I gather, are not allowed to invest in Metropolitan Consolidated Stock; can you explain why they are not allowed?—I did not state in my report that the trustees are not now allowed to invest in Metropolitan Consolidated Stock, but merely that the original trust deed did not authorise that investment. There has been a subsequent extension of the power of trustees by legislation; and the investments were proper ones. Had that been brought to my notice at the time of writing the report I should not have inserted these paragraphs.

737. Then you consider now, from what you have learned since, that they are authorised to invest in that stock?—Yes, although not authorised by the original trust deed by which I was auditing. My attention was afterwards called to the fact that Parliament had by the

Trustee

Mr. Bayley—continued.

Trustee Act extended the power of trustees, and that Metropolitan Consolidated Stock and Belfast Corporation Stock would come within the powers as extended by statute.

Commander Bethell.

738. The Commissioners varied their trust before the explanation was pointed out to you, although the investment appears to have been a very good one?—Yes, but the Commissioners were within their right in investing as they did.

Commander Bethell—continued.

739. But upon your report they varied it?—Yes.

740. And they need not have done so?—No, they need not have done so unless they had chosen. Attention was called to it by my report, and the Commissioners decided to vary it.

Colonel J. S. YOUNG, re-called; and further Examined.

Chairman.

741. YOU have been in the room, have you not, during the examination of the last three witnesses?—Yes.

742. Is there anything that you would like to add to your examination in chief, arising out of anything that has been said to the Committee by these witnesses?—Yes, upon more than one point, if I might; and I would first ask the leave of the Committee to refer to an answer given by Mr. Taylor to the honourable Member for Devonport, with regard to which, perhaps, if Mr. Taylor were asked further upon it, I think it might be satisfactory to the Committee. It was as to whether the efficacy of the administration of the Commissioners of their various trusts came under his province to review or to look at; I think that it might be added to the evidence of Mr. Taylor, if he is willing to concur in what I say, that it is undoubtedly part of the duty of the auditor to see that the administrative provisions of every trust, whether they are laid down by Act of Parliament, by a trust-deed, or by a Royal warrant, are observed, and he, as auditor, is distinctly responsible for seeing them carried out with administrative efficiency in accordance with those provisions.

743. Is it necessary to put any explanation of that kind before the Committee in face of the action of Mr. Tripp in calling attention to investments made, in his judgment, contrary to the provisions of the trust-deed?—I think the honourable Member for Devonport may have gathered the idea that it did not come within the auditor's province to have regard to administrative efficiency in connection with his work as auditing the accounts.

744. The Committee, at any rate, may take it that there we have a direct example of the manner in which the accountant of the Home Office has exercised that judgment; and several witnesses have spoken of what they regard as the administrative efficiency and accuracy with which the Commissioners' work is done. I do not think, therefore, we need pursue that further?—I think that serves my point.

Mr. Kearley.

745. I understood Mr. Taylor to testify as to the administrative efficacy in connection with the accounts. The question I wished to put to Mr. Taylor was as to whether he was in any position to testify as to the general efficiency of the administration of the Patriotic Commissioners, outside that which he has particularised?—It is exactly that point that I desire to bring out. The policy of the Commissioners must, if I may use the expression, be bound by the conditions of the instrument under which they administer their trust; they cannot go outside of it.

Mr. Kearley—continued.

746. We are rather prejudicing the whole question of the inquiry, are we not?—I am only trying to bring that out as a point which it is necessary to bring out in the case of the Commissioners, if I may put it so.

Chairman.

747. So far as I have been able to follow the evidence, we may take it that the Commissioners, in administering the Patriotic Fund and the different funds entrusted to them, observe the conditions laid down for them by trust-deeds, by instruments, and by Acts of Parliament, and that the business of yourself in carrying that out under the directions of the Commissioners, and of the different accountants and auditors and actuaries who are called in, is to see that those conditions are observed; but none of the gentlemen who have appeared have expressed themselves as capable of intruding upon what might be called the policy of administration which the Commissioners themselves are alone answerable for?—That is so. My only point is that they cannot go outside of their trust-deeds in a question of policy.

748. Is there any other point you would like to make an explanation upon?—Yes. The honourable Member for Guildford, as you are aware, asked that certain returns might be prepared. These I would desire to put in as far as I have been able to prepare them; but I should like, in putting them in, to explain that the exact return that the honourable Member desired can hardly furnish completely the state of the case as it is now, in comparison with the state of the case as the return was when Parliament ordered it to be furnished in 1870.

749. You are speaking now of a return showing the applications for assistance which have been refused?—Yes, so that I have gone a little beyond the return of 1870, in order to meet the altered conditions of the present time.

750. And over what period are you proposing to put in that?—I have put in returns for the years 1893, 1894, and up to the present time, 1895, strictly in accordance with the form that was used in 1870.

Chairman—continued.

751. But the different conditions on which relief is given during those years as compared with 1871 necessitated some deviation from the actual form?—Hardly that; but if I were to limit the cases strictly to those provided for according to the form of the form of 1870, I should omit a great bulk of cases, the knowledge of which might come to the Committee naturally, as they may be aggrieved, that they cannot get relief, and consequently I prepared, in addition to returns on the form as in 1870, a list of applications received during 1894 and 1895, for relief from the Patriotic Fund but not eligible for relief as having been married after the 1st of January 1858, or giving no evidence of date of marriage. That is to say, we get a letter, an application, stating that the husband served in the Crimean War, and we immediately reply that the conditions of eligibility as laid down by Act of Parliament require that some proof must be given, which can be accepted as satisfactory, that the death of the husband was due to service in the Russian War; again, that the marriage took place before 1858. Then there is another class of cases, which are renewed applications during 1894 and 1895, for relief from the Patriotic Fund from widows married before 1858, which could not be entertained owing to no proof being forthcoming that the death of the husband was due directly to the Russian War service, as required by Section 5 of the Patriotic Fund Act, 1867, or which had been refused, the cause of death of husband not being due to Russian War service. Many of these are renewed, and renewed, and renewed again.

752. Then, if you put in these returns, the Committee, when they have seen them in print, may probably take an opportunity of examining you upon them?—If the Committee would like to do so, I shall be quite prepared. Then the honourable Member for Devonport, in a question which he asked me, said, "May I remind you that the Return of 1871 was prepared at a month's notice?" I should like to put in this letter from the secretary, my predecessor, to the Under Secretary of State for War, to show the great labour and the utter disruption of the office caused by the preparation of that Return, because I rather urged upon the Committee in my answer that there was not the slightest difficulty in preparing the Return, but that, owing to the limited staff in my office, it would be a matter of very considerable labour.

753. Your staff is now much smaller than it was in 1871?—It is just exactly one-third, and we now undertake what they did not in 1871, the direct payment of the allowances; and on the 1st of June, which is very close at hand, the whole office staff is taken up in connection with the machinery for the reception of evidence of the existence and circumstances of the recipients of relief and consequent payments to be made.

754. You have not told us how long it took to prepare the Return presented in 1871?—This is the letter, if I may read it. It is from my predecessor, under date the 5th of January 1871, to the Under Secretary of State for War: "Sir,—I delayed replying to your letter of the 19th December in the hope of being able to give a definite answer as to the date when the return for Parliament would be ready. The staff of this office is very limited indeed, and the return in question is of a most extensive nature, and has so much interfered with the current work of the office that everything is in arrear in consequence. The return is, however, now completed in rough, but each case detailed in it requires my personal revision before the fair sheets are written. I shall begin at once, and I propose sending the return to the War Office by instalments to enable it to be printed." It took one month more from the time when that letter was written before the return was actually made.

755. The return was ordered when?—In July 1870.

756. And presented to Parliament when?—In February 1871.

757. You think there was no avoidable delay?—Certainly not; for it is a return that speaks for itself as to the immensity of detail that has to be gone through, and the personal labour that is necessary to secure accuracy in those details before it can be completed.

758. Is there any other point you wish to mention?—Another honourable Member asked me a question as to the casualties in the Zulu War Fund. It was as to the discrepancy between the number of widows originally placed upon the fund, 98, and the present number, 25. I think the honourable Member asked me to explain the differences, and I have got them out. There were 10 widows who died; seven were struck off for misconduct; two received temporary allowances; 54 re-married; and that makes up the total with the 25 remaining. In my evidence in chief I stated that owing to the paucity of the fund in the first instance it was not considered proper that widows should have allowances on re-marriage; but we have restored that liability lately. Then the honourable Member for Devonport referred to-day to the question of whether a general actuarial revaluation of all the funds could be prepared up to the latest date, with a view to an aggregate statement being furnished by the actuary as to the surplus upon all the funds administered by the Commission (I think I am right in that?). I have had the necessary statistical particulars made out for all the funds for which we ordinarily seek actuarial re-valuations from time to time by Mr. Finlaison. Of course, these re-valuations are not effected without an appreciable cost in the case of small funds in relation to the cost of management generally. For instance, the "Atalanta" Fund is one of these that would have to be re-valued. The income of that Fund in 1894 was only 295*l.*, and if you turn to page 18 of my statement you will see that the total charge for cost of management was 12*l.* for the year. If you add five guineas to that as the cost of an actuarial re-valuation you bring it up to very close upon 50 per cent. additional; and the only importance that is to be attached to that is this: that the Commissioners, of course, may have adverse criticisms made upon their cost of management, and they have desired in the case of these small funds to make the valuation only at such intervals tervals as they have felt were absolutely necessary. Consequently that has been done only once in three years. And another reason for the valuation being limited to these periods of three years has been that the trust deeds themselves are so specific in limiting the powers of the Commissioners that there is no great object, so far as the responsibility of the Commission is concerned, in making these valuations very frequent. For instance, in the case of the "Eurydice" Relief Fund no surplus whatever can be taken from that fund until the last annuitant is dead, according to a specific paragraph in the deed to that effect. Therefore, all that I wish to say is that, of course, while the Commissioners are entirely at the disposal of the Committee in furnishing all information as to the actuarial valuation up to the latest dates, the Committee will kindly bear in mind that if we have to bear that cost, it is, so far as the practice is concerned in regard to the smaller funds, a thing regarded by the Commissioners as unnecessary.

Captain Norton.

759. Are you of opinion that previously the office was over staffed; you stated, I think, that the office was reduced by two-thirds?—Yes, it was nine before and it is now three. The explanation of that is not very difficult. I am speaking of 24 years ago. There were a great many more recipients upon the original Patriotic Fund at that time than there are at the present day; but a still greater cause for a reduction in the office staff was the simplification of account keeping, and the fact that while in 1870 it was the custom in all Government offices of the day to require an attendance only from 10 to 4, the Patriotic Fund office has been placed upon the seven hours scale; and I think the auditor will bear me out that we are very seldom within the seven hours at the present time, and consequently that accounts a great deal for the smaller number to-day, and therefore it would be hardly fair to say that in that day they were over staffed, because we happen to do the work to-day with a lesser staff, and perhaps a greater amount of work per head.

Chairman.

760. Have you anything further to bring before the Committee?—No, that concludes all that I have to say about the points that were brought before the Committee.

Mr. Kearley.

761. On that matter which we have been discussing, in calling for a general balance sheet, there are practically two separate classes of funds with which you deal, those in which the number of beneficiaries is fixed and determined, such as the "Patriotic Fund," "Captain," "Eurydice," "Victoria," and those classes of funds; that is so, is it not?—Hardly, as you put it.

762. Let me put it a little more fully?—But I think I can answer it directly, understanding what you desire.

763. I will state what I consider to be the other class of funds. I think there are two separate classes of funds?—That is so.

Mr. Kearley—continued.

764. It will have to be regarded in that way, at all events, in calling for a general balance-sheet. The other class includes funds such as the "Soldiers' Effects Fund," the "Rodriguez Fund," the "Royal Naval Relief Fund," where the persons who are entitled to relief are altogether uncertain. There may come a war that may throw an enormous number of people on those funds, and consequently the surpluses that might be stated now would be misleading. But as regards the first class of funds, unless, of course, it is decided to increase the allowances, if it is once determined that the basis of a pension and so on shall continue, as it is now, there would be no difficulty, would there, in lumping the whole of those funds together, subject always to the terms of the trust, so that where it was found that there were detachable surplus assets, it could be dealt with at once for other purposes?—Well, the honourable Member has addressed to me a long question, and, if I may say so, it is one which involves a great deal that is argumentative; but I would prefer to take at once one illustration of his classification which is slightly faulty. The Patriotic Fund cannot be classed in the same classification with the "Captain," the "Eurydice," and the "Atalanta" Relief Funds, for this reason: Parliament has said by the Patriotic Fund Act of 1867 that the widows of any men who died in or by service in the Russian War shall be eligible for pecuniary relief. We have cases every day, I might almost say, of applicants for relief, and it is perfectly true that few get relief, but some do; and if the honourable Member will look at the latest Report of the Royal Commissioners, he will see that the Commissioners say that if Her Majesty's advisers advise Her Majesty to extend the provisions of the Act of 1867, it will be their pleasure to place upon the Patriotic Fund such an additional number of widows as in their opinion the fund will permit.

765. Going outside the trust conditions?—It cannot be said to be going outside the trust when Parliament itself would grant the authority.

766. You admit that the Patriotic Commissioners could invoke the aid of Parliament to enlarge the conditions of the trust?—Many of my answers in evidence-in-chief were directed to show as conclusively as possible that the policy of the Commissioners from 1867 has been dictated by the Legislature, and from the Legislature by the Government of the day.

767. We are rather digressing, I fear. The point I wish to make perfectly clear is that in the case of certain funds the number of beneficiaries is fixed and determined, and I wish to know whether the Patriotic Fund is not one of those funds?—Certainly not.

768. You reply by saying that according to the conditions under which you administer that fund you are bound to admit as beneficiaries those that have some sort of connection with soldiers who served in the Crimean War?—That is so.

769. While you urge that you have not been able to arrive at a determination of who those people may be; do I understand that there is still an outstanding balance of people that are entitled to the benefits of this fund in connection with the war of 1854 that have not yet received their benefits; is there still a contingent liability on this Patriotic Fund in connection with those that are entitled to its benefits?—Undoubtedly; if they can prove that their husbands' deaths were due to service in the Russian War.

770. Surely you would not say that you were not able to take an estimate of that?—I should say that any man who was rash enough to make an estimate of that would hardly be justified by events; for we have reached that period in relation to the Crimean War in which deaths are taking place to a far greater extent than they did even five years ago of men who were actually wounded in that war; and evidence has come to us in individual cases which we cannot ignore that the wounds may have contributed even in these late days to the death of the man.

771. Very well, I will not press the point. We understand that you differ; you say that the number of beneficiaries on the Patriotic Fund is not fixed and not determined?—Clearly.

Mr. Bayley.

772. Clearly there is further liability, because there may be some who may say that the man's life was shortened by wounds received in the Crimean War. I can bear you out that in one case an affidavit was made by a medical man that the man's life was shortened from that cause; that he did not die of wounds received a few years ago but of wounds received in the Crimea?—I will give an instance. Last week there came an application vouched exceedingly well that the man's death was due to rupture which he sustained in the Light Brigade Charge at the Battle of Balaclava; and that man's widow has been put on the Patriotic Fund from the 1st of April with an allowance of 8*s.* a week.

773. There have been very few of those cases?—Very few. But what I wish the Committee to appreciate is, that the Commissioners have in their last report indicated that the surplus in regard to the Patriotic Fund of 74,000*l.* warrants them in submitting to Her Majesty, that if Her Majesty's advisers think fit, they see no objection to the application of the Patriotic Fund being widened.

Chairman.

774. But as a matter of fact under the Act of 1867 the funds are made available for the children of those who have fallen in any other war?—That is so.

775. And further, of the children of those who may hereafter lose their lives in the service of the Crown?—That is so. I only wanted to clear up in the honourable Member's mind that the Patriotic Fund cannot be classified with the "Captain," the "Eurydice," and the "Atalanta" funds, which cannot be applied, as long as the trusts are observed, to any but the widows and orphans of those who actually went down in these vessels. In these cases the number is limited and cannot be exceeded, and the Commissioners are bound to carry out the provisions of those deeds; but that does not apply to the Patriotic Fund.

Mr. Kearley.

776. I think it would be desirable if we maintain the sequence of your evidence-in-chief, and therefore I shall commence my questions by questions relating to the main Patriotic Fund. We have had the opportunity of reading your statement of the 30th April, and listening to your evidence of 3rd May and 10th May, and it appears from your reply to questions that you maintain that in passing the Acts of 1886 and 1867 Parliament had no intention of condoning the building of the school and the large sums taken from the fund and devoted exclusively to its maintenance?—I think I can best answer that by quoting the Act itself.

777. Will you allow me to put it to you; would you mind answering yes or no as to what I clearly understand to be the result of your evidence?—I do not want to fence with the question at all, but putting into my mouth the word "condoning," and asking me to say yes or no, seems to me to be interpreting the actual wording of an Act of Parliament, which speaks for itself as to what was the object of the Act of Parliament.

778. Will you quote it?—The Act of 1867 says: "And whereas the Executive Committee of the Commissioners thereby appointed" (that is, under the original Commission of October 1854) "have appropriated part of the fund for the erection and endowment of a girls' school, known as the Royal "Victoria" Patriotic Asylum, and have appropriated the other part of the fund for the endowment of a boys' school, and have appropriated other parts of the fund for the purposes described in the Schedule to this Act, and the appropriations aforesaid have been adopted by the Commissioners, and have been from time to time approved by Her Majesty, or been specified in the Reports of the Commissioners made to Her Majesty, and laid before the Houses of Parliament; and it is expedient that the appropriations aforesaid be now confirmed by Parliament."

779. That is the Act of 1867?—Yes.

780. But may I invite your attention to the preamble of the Act of 1866, which you will read: "Doubts have arisen respecting the power of Her Majesty to give directions concerning the application of the fund further, or other than those contained in the said Commission"?—Yes.

781. You do not consider that as having been taken as condoning the building of the school; because I contend that in the original Commission you had no such powers, and that you were going outside the powers of the original Commission in building and endowing those schools?—Well, it seems to me that the direct answer to that is this: that the Act of 1867 cancelled the Act of 1866; it has no more life.

782. That is not the point; the point is as to whether you had power under the original Commission to build and endow those schools?—Well, then the preamble throws doubts not upon the power of the Commissioners to do this, that, or the other thing, but the power of Her Majesty to give directions concerning the further application of the fund; and, therefore, the Act of 1867 was passed; but in no paragraph of that Act, as far as I know, will it be found that the view is taken that thereby Parliament was required to condone the appropriation. It is distinctly stated in the paragraph which I read from that Act that all these Acts have been approved by Her Majesty, and that they have been laid before the Houses of Parliament.

Chairman.

783. May we not take it, as Mr. Kearley has suggested, that the Act of 1866 recognised that a doubt had been raised as to whether the powers under the original Commission covered the erection of these institutions; whereas, the Act of 1867 succeeding that of 1866 confirmed everything that had been so done?—No, I am sorry I cannot accept that at all; because the Preamble of the Act is perfectly clear as to what its object was; not that there was any doubt as to the power of the Commissioners, but that doubts had arisen as to the power of Her Majesty to give directions as to the application of the fund, other than those contained in the said Commission.

Mr. Kearley.

784. My view, and I think that of the Committee generally, is that there was no authority, either expressed or implied, in the original Commission for the building of these schools, and that, therefore, the Act of Parliament was necessary; you do not agree with that?—Certainly not.

785. You maintain that the Commissioners were not going outside their trusts in building and endowing these schools?—Certainly.

786. Can you point to any powers given to you under the Royal Commission to build these schools?—The Royal Commission, I think, although a lengthy document, was drawn exceedingly widely; and it must be remembered that there was no question raised even in 1866 as to the power of the Crown to sanction appropriations under the Commission of 1854, and, as I have pointed out, the Preamble of the Act of 1867 distinctly recognises that all the acts done by the Commissioners prior to the passing of that Act had received the Royal approval; and as regards the Royal Victoria Patriotic Asylum, it is a matter of history that the Prince Consort was the President of the Royal Commission originally, and that he personally took a great interest in the founding of the Royal Victoria Patriotic Asylum.

787. I think we know that; I think that is historical; and I understand that you still adhere to the idea that this Patriotic Fund was to be used for benefiting those that fell in the Crimean War?—Certainly.

788. And yet you set aside a large sum of money to endow these schools for girls' and the boys' school; could you not have foreseen that in a few years it would be impossible to fill these schools with orphans of the Crimean War?—Of course, the honourable Member is referring to matters about which personal cognisance on my part is a matter of impossibility. I can only go to sources of information which are open to every one, and I pointed out in my evidence-in-chief, that in the Second Report, Paragraph 5, the Commissioners undoubtedly express their view that the building of the Royal Victoria Patriotic Asylum was in accordance with the instructions of Her Majesty, and that they decided to appropriate this endowment as a permanent memorial of the public generosity evoked by the circumstances of the Crimean War.

Mr. Kearley—continued.

789. I noticed all that, but that is the opinion of the Commissioners. You do not point to a single paragraph in the original Commission to justify the Commissioners coming to that decision?—I point to the words of the Commissioners themselves, "We also considered it in accordance with our instructions from your Majesty to make a further provision for the objects of our care in such a manner as would confer permanent benefits on the two services."

790. I am trying to ask you to point if you can to the evidence of the Commission under which you were entitled to act at the outset; I will not press you further upon that, but the fact is that at the present moment there are no orphans naturally from the Crimean War in the Victoria Asylum?—Hence the authorisation granted by Parliament in the Act of 1867 to apply the benefits of the Patriotic Fund to the orphans of other wars, and ultimately, indeed, when there was no such orphans available, to those of men who might die in or by reason of ervice in the Navy or Army.

Captain Norton.

791. It was clearly an error of judgment or mismanagement to erect this Royal Victoria Asylum for the education of a limited number of children, the Commissioners knowing that after a very limited time these children would disappear and grow up, and that this large institution would be thrown upon their hands?—That is an ex post facto judgment.

Mr. Kearley.

792. Now, you have only been connected with the Patriotic Fund in recent years?—Yes, that is so.

793. But you know its history very well; thoroughly?—I hope so.

794. There was an inquiry held at the instance of the War Department and the Admiralty into the administration of the Patriotic Fund; we have all this correspondence dealing with it. I believe Sir Robert Hamilton presided at that inquiry?—He was associated with Sir Henry White and General Hutt.

795. I put it to you in a general way, that the whole of the difficulties that arose in the administration of this fund proceeded from the building and endowing of these schools, which I maintain you had no authority to do, and that the final outcome was that the boys' school had to be sold. There was a large expenditure of money in connection with that. This inquiry brought out all kinds of abuses in these schools, many of which or all of which can be traced in the Parliamentary Debates, and in your own reports, and the general management of the schools was chaotic and the wasteful expenditure was extreme. Is that a fair recital historically considered of what happened up to the time that Parliament held the inquiry when they threatened to dissolve the Commission?—If you are asking for my own judgment, I should say that is a very partial view indeed of the state of affairs that was brought to light in 1880.

796. I do not want to go very deeply into the past, but everything that I suggest is suggested from statements made in your own reports. The only point I want to make is that you were outside your powers in building these schools. However, we will pass on now to what passed after the Acts of Parliament were passed; at all events, the Acts of Parliament of 1867, and the Supplementary Commission of 1868 confirmed these appropriations. Then they go on to direct the Commissioners to apply the funds on three bases: first to widows of the Russian War only?—That is so. You will find that on page 3 of my statement extracted in full from the Act.

797. "First, in relief of widows and maintenance, education, training, and advancement of children of soldiers, seamen, and marines of our Army and Navy who lost their lives in battle in the late War with Russia"; and so on; secondly, in relief of orphans of "any other war"; thirdly, in the maintenance of children of men who had lost their lives through "casualties sustained, or disease contracted in the service of the Crown." Now can you inform the Committee, roughly, what has since been done for orphans mentioned in the two last clauses other than admitting them to the schools?—In my examination-in-chief, I gave the amount of pecuniary expenditure under that head which had taken place up to 1879 and after 1879; that is, 8,286*l.* 11s. 2*d.* on behalf of the education of orphans of officers; and of course there has been the expenditure, if you like to place it in the same category, of the Roman Catholic Orphans Fund; and it might be fair to put it in that category, inasmuch as the Roman Catholic Orphans Fund was created out of the money realised by the sale of the boys' school.

798. That was in 1890?—1882.

799. It was made a special item for the first time in the report in 1890, but it came in in 1882?—Yes, it was always included at the bottom of the actuarial report of the Patriotic Fund under the heading of "appropriated to Roman Catholic orphans," so that it has always appeared really.

800. Does that represent all that has been done for orphans eligible for relief under the second and third provisions of the Act with which we are dealing?—That is so as regards pecuniary aid, with the exception of the trifling amounts that have been paid out of the Rodriguez Fund.

801. Now, I have before me a table showing the number of orphans receiving relief from the original Patriotic Fund, the Patriotic Fund, which shows that the numbers which were in 1882, 75 children of officers, and 103 children of non-commissioned officers and men, have gradually dwindled down to eight of the former and 10 of the latter in 1894. Having regard to the clauses of the Act of 1867, may I ask if these are the only persons coming under these two categories who are now considered entitled to relief?—Certainly.

Mr. Kearley—continued.

802. The only people that are on the fund entitled to relief as orphans?—Yes.

803. And I think from one of your answers I may suggest that the Commissioners, from time to time, have bewailed their want of power to find suitable persons for relieving. I do not wish to overstate the character of your reply, but you do feel that you have these funds available and you cannot find people suitable to come and participate in them?—The "Rodriguez" Fund, do you mean?

804. No, I am speaking of the Patriotic Fund?—Excuse me, I never gave such an answer as that. Without going back into my evidence I think what I said was that we have kept the Royal Victoria Patriotic Asylum and the Roman Catholic Orphans Fund absolutely full.

805. This was the question put to you by the Chairman, Question No. 143 on the 3rd of May: "Are you able to say that there have been no cases really of indigent and necessitous persons brought under the notice of the Commissioners in aid of whom this money might have been applied?"—That is with regard to the "Rodriguez" Fund.

806. I rather took it that it governed the Patriotic Fund, as you mentioned that it was to be applied for like purposes?—I think we did get a little mixed in that part of my examination.

807. Still, that is your explanation: that you intended it only to apply to the "Rodriguez" Fund?—Yes; certainly.

808. Then you could not, at all events, as far as the "Rodriguez" Fund was concerned, find people who could participate in the advantages of the fund?—Under the terms of the "Rodriguez" Fund; not under the terms of the Act of 1867 that you were asking about.

809. Now, as to the Patriotic Fund, under the third clause you were intended to educate and maintain and advance the children of those who lost their lives in the service of the Crown. Now, surely there have been many wars in recent years in which men have been killed; there have been many men that have lost their lives in the Navy, for instance, falling from aloft; do I correctly understand that all those that might have a claim have been considered?—The application of the Patriotic Fund under those two clauses is limited entirely to the placing of orphans in the Royal Victoria Patriotic Asylum and in orphanages under the Roman Catholic Orphans Fund.

810. Limited by whom?—Limited by the endowments, by the funds available, and by the Act of Parliament.

811. Do you say by the Act of Parliament?—I say by the Act of Parliament and the funds available.

812. May I divide that statement; may I ask you where, under the Act of Parliament, these benefits are confined to admittance to the Royal Patriotic Schools?—In times past several orphans of other wars have received allowances; and, as a matter of fact, one such is still included in the accounts of the Patriotic Fund; but the honourable Member will remember that in 1880 the financial crisis that arose made it impossible for the Patriotic Fund Commissioners sioners to discharge fully the obligations that they had incurred under their previous Commission.

813. I do not want to go back to 1881; I want to deal with this Act; under this Act there are certain conditions set out under which you can administer these funds?—That is so.

814. There is no restriction in this Act that these benefits shall consist of admission to the Royal Patriotic Asylum?—Certainly not.

815. Under Clause 3 you have power to maintain, educate, train and advance "children of other soldiers, seamen, and marines of our Army and Navy who have lost or hereafter lose their lives in the service of the Crown, or by, or in consequence of casualties sustained, or disease contracted in the service of the Crown"?—That is so.

816. Do you maintain that you have met all that is intended in that clause?—Certainly.

817. And also all that is intended in Clause 2?—Certainly.

818. Now, since 1882 the Patriotic Fund, according to Mr. Finlaison's valuation, has shown a larger and constantly increasing surplus until 1891, when the pension list was revised, and now it again shows an increase; the charges that you threw on the fund in 1891 diminished the surplus from 112,000*l.* in 1890 to 65,000*l.* in 1891; but since then it has been steadily increasing again in spite of those charges placed on the fund, and we have heard from Mr. Finliason that the surplus of 74,000*l.* in 1894 was arrived at after the most stringent valuation used by actuaries; you have heard Mr. Finlaison's evidence?—I heard that evidence.

819. Do you allege on behalf of the Commissioners that there have been no applicants during these 14 years, who could have been relieved out of these surplus funds under the powers of the Act of 1867?—My answer to that is, that the Commissioners before entertaining an extension of the benefits of the Patriotic Fund to persons who had not already been admitted to its benefits, were bound by a clause in the Act of 1867, to continue and extend the benefits of the fund, as they were before the financial crisis of 1880, to those that were already on the fund; and it is in pursuance of that policy that increasing liabilities commencing with that which the honourable Member has referred to in 1891, have been undertaken up to the present time; but if the honourable Member will refer to this very last report that has been issued by the Commissioners he will observe that they themselves were surprised at the increased surplus which was disclosed at the 31st of December 1894.

820. May I deal with the statement that you have just made; you stated that these increases made in 1891, were occasioned by the apparent increasing surpluses; you found that you had large sums of money available, and consequently you decided to become more liberal in 1891?—The first step was to restore to the grants which had been in force before the financial crisis in 1881 those that were already on the fund entitled thereto.

821. That is not quite my question; my question is this, that in 1891 it became apparent to you that your surplus assets were largely increasing, and that in consequence of that you made these further concessions to beneficiaries?—That is clearly so.

822. Now, I have a statement here of the visible surplus assets of the Patriotic Fund, extending from 1881 to the present moment; in the year 1890, that is the year prior to your making these additional grants, the visible surplus assets, according to your own report, were 112,000*l.* odd; in 1889 they were 111,000*l.*; in 1888, 109,000*l.*; in 1887, 106,000*l.*; in 1886 they were 97,000*l.*; in 1885, 93,000*l.*; in 1884, 84,000*l.*; in 1883, 80,000*l.*; and so on; how was it that these assets, which were visible, at all events, to the extent of allowing you to expose them in your reports, did not lead the Patriotic Fund Commissioners to take steps earlier than 1891 to confer additional advantages on the beneficiaries already on the fund?—The answer, I think, is perfectly clear. The numbers in those earlier days, about 1884 and 1885, of the personswhom they afterwards restored to full allowances, were such as the figures given in the year 1891 prove, I think conclusively, would have been more than the fund would have borne; and therefore, it would obviously have been an unwise thing to have dealt with the surpluses earlier than they did because of the liability that followed necessarily upon dealing with the first class of annuitants, that is, the re-married women who had been deprived of restoration to full allowances before those dates.

823. But whilst the surplus assets were increasing the number chargeable on the fund were largely diminishing year by year; that is the feature of the whole fund, that the widows and re-married women and orphans year by year were declining in numbers, and the whole time the visible surplus assets were augmenting rapidly?—That is so, but if the honourable Member has followed me, it was a question of the exact moment at which it was safe to commence to incur these great liabilities for increases of allowances.

824. The moment was 1891 in the opinion of the Commissioners?—In the opinion of the Commissioners.

825. Now, have not the Commissioners formed some idea of their justification of this policy in consequence of the instructions from the War Department to hold the balance of this fund to form the nucleus of some other fund?—In my evidence in chief I endeavoured to emphasise the fact that in 1881 the Government of the day indicated a distinct policy to be followed with reference to the surpluses of the various funds; but there was no direction to the Commissioners to regard these as to be held up for an indefinite period; and the evidence of that is that, in regard to the Patriotic Fund, the Commissioners have this year arrived at the conclusion, in consequence of the valuation of Mr. Finlaison, showing an unexpected large surplus, that the time has arrived in regard to the Patriotic Fund only, when an extension of the application of the funds or its surplus can be carried out in accordance with the policy indicated by the Legislature in the Act of 1881.

826. Yes

Mr. Kearley—continued.

826. Yes; but under the Act of 1881 you had no power given you to (if I may use the word, you will understand that it is not in an offensive sense) hoard up these funds; you had no power given you by the Act of 1881 to save these balances till some future period when you might utilise them for some special fund, the fund indicated in that correspondence which took place between the Secretary of State for War and the Patriotic Fund Commissioners?—It would be obviously absurd, if I may say so, to put into an Act which was an enabling Act a saving clause of that nature.

827. The Act of 1881 gave you power to do at any moment what you really decided to do in 1891, and have not done yet in 1895?—Hardly; I think the honourable Member, if I may say so, has not quite grasped the order laid down by that Act. That Act says that it shall be lawful for Her Majesty to issue a supplementary Commission to give effect to the clauses. Obviously that is not a thing within the power of the Commissioners; that is a thing which can only be carried out under the advice of Her Majesty's advisers.

828. How do you propose, now, to get Her Majesty's advisers to exercise that power; you say now you have arrived at a decision that something ought to be done with these surpluses, and you are going to invoke the aid of the Act of 1881; how do you propose to get Her Majesty to issue this supplementary Commission; are you going to apply to Parliament, or to make an application direct to Her Majesty?—We cannot approach Her Majesty direct in such a matter.

829. Then you will approach Her through Parliament?—No, through Her Majesty's advisers.

830. Through the Government of the day?—Through the Government of the day.

831. That is the machinery that you are going to put in motion in order to utilise this large surplus that you have in hand?—I would rather put it in this way: that as the Act of 1881 was an Act passed by the Government of the day on their own initiative, and that, as it provides a certain process, the Commissioners may call attention to the process, as they have done in the 33rd Report to Her Majesty.

Chairman.

832. Would you mind telling the Committee the provision made in the Act of 1881 for the treatment of surpluses?—Yes; it is Section 4: "It shall be lawful for Her Majesty from time to time by supplementary Commission under Her Royal Sign Manual to direct the Commissioners of the Patriotic Fund to apply the Patriotic Fund, and the income and accumulations thereof, or any parts thereof (so far as not appropriated for the Royal Patriotic Asylum for Girls, and for the purposes mentioned in the Schedule to the Patriotic Fund Act, 1867, and so far as not required to meet liabilities and claims existing prior to the date of such Commission), for such purposes for the benefit of the widows and children of officers and men of Her Majesty's military and naval forces, and in such manner as may be directed by the said Commission, and so far as any direction in the Commission does not extend, as the Commissioners from time to time think expedient."

Chairman—continued.

Mr. Kearley.

833. That Act is a dead letter at the present time?—Hardly; it has been always before the Commissioners.

834. Which part of it have the Commissioners utilised?—In regard to policy.

835. Have the Commissioners utilised the powers given to them under Section 4 of that Act in any way?—My answers have been directed to show that, in the opinion of the Commissioners, the time had not arrived ——

836. That is not a direct reply to my question. I asked you whether the Commissioners had availed themselves of the powers given to them under this Act?—I will answer that by saying that the Commissioners would, in their opinion, have been wrong in taking any steps to detach a surplus from a corpus which undoubtedly had to meet liabilities which had been created by legislative Acts and Royal Commissions.

837. Have the Commissioners taken any steps to let officers of both services and the public generally know that there are this and other surpluses of funds available for orphans?—Obviously, for the reasons I have given just now, it would be going beyond the duty of the Commissioners at the present time.

838. And no steps have been taken to give them publicity?—Is it right to press me upon a point making want of publicity to these surpluses——

839. I do not wish to make it in any way such as you suggest; I merely want to know whether you have made a practice of advertising that you had these surpluses, and that really you would be glad to hear of available orphans?—I think the greatest publicity is given by the fact that all the Reports to Her Majesty by the Commissioners are presented to Parliament, and, as a matter of fact, every one of these Reports is commented upon every year by the papers.

840. Supposing I were to go to Aldershot and stop the first soldier I met and ask him if he knew the Patriotic Fund, and that there were available surpluses in the hands of the Patriotic Fund Commissioners, do you think he would be perfectly aware of that fact?—It would depend upon whether he was married or not.

841. You think that is the only qualification?—I think the Patriotic Fund is very well known at Aldershot.

842. We will pass now to the "Soldiers' Effects Fund," which shows even a larger surplus than the Patriotic Fund, a surplus likely to increase many thousands of pounds every year. You have already given us in your evidence the history of the formation of this fund, and you have quoted from the Royal Warrants as to its disposition. Now I wish to call your attention to a paragraph in the second Warrant, which is now, I believe, the authority on the subject. You state in your reply to Question 323 that not only has this fund provided for the families of those who lost their lives in the Egyptian Campaign, "but of all subsequent campaigns, whatever they may have been, and for all all cases of those who come under the second category, dying from injury directly traceable to military duty;" can you inform the Committee how many have been relieved from "other" campaigns, and how many of the second category?—What other campaigns do you refer to?

843. The other campaigns that have transpired since the Egyptian Campaign?—I could tell you by reference to the books. I could say off-hand that widows of men who fell in Burmah have been relieved.

844. The words of the Warrant are, "shall be applied in payment of such compassionate, annual, or other allowances to the widows and children or other dependent relatives of soldiers dying on service, or within six months after discharge, and generally in such manner for the benefit of such widows and children or other dependent relatives of soldiers dying as aforesaid." Then we have, under the heads of (a), (b), (c), the qualifications set out: "(a) Were killed in action, or died of wounds received in action, or from illness which can be directly traced to fatigue, privation, or exposure incident to active operations in the field, within 12 months of sustaining such wound or contracting such illness; (b) Died from an injury directly traceable to military duty within 12 months of sustaining such injury; (c) Died from illness directly traceable to fatigue, privation, or exposure in the performance of military duty." Now, I have before me a tabular statement, taken from the Reports, of the numbers of widows and orphans on the funds since 1884, which has steadily decreased since 1886; and the point I want to put to you is this: that since then we have had continuously small wars and campaigns in India and West Africa in which British troops have been engaged; in fact, I think you referred to losses which have been reported quite recently; have you had no recent claims arising from these wars which can be relieved from the "Soldiers' Effects" Fund?—I should say that there were no cases that we know of that have not been relieved, inasmuch as the War Office, having transferred to us this fund, makes a practice of transferring to the Commissioners all cases that come within its cognisance of widows and orphans of men who have died from wounds or sickness sustained in warlike operations.

845. Let me call your attention to the increase in the assets. In 1885, the surplus assets were 21,974*l.*; in 1888, they had risen to 57,000*l.*, roughly; in 1890, they had risen to 71,728*l.*; in 1892, they had risen to 93,356*l.*; and in 1893, to 100,334*l.*; what explanation can you offer of this increase in the surplus?—The increase is absolutely certain to go on if there should occur no war in which European troops are engaged; for the Secretary of State for War, in notifying the issue of the Royal Warrant which constituted the "Soldiers' Effects" Fund, intimated that the grants of allowances under the Warrant "shall extend to all cases of death arising from war services since the 1st July 1882;" and "if the allowances so granted should not absorb the whole of the sum (which they did not), the balance of the fund should not be appropriated in granting allowances for other than war services, but should be kept in hand as a reserve fund to meet any extraordinary demand." And I may supplement that, following up a thought which occurred to me from the honourable Member's previous question as regards Indian wars, that the widows and orphans of native troops, which are those which are mostly employed in these frontier wars, would not be eligible for the "Soldiers' Effects" Fund, inasmuch as the "Soldiers' Effects" Fund is created entirely by the effects of European soldiers.

846. You attach more importance, apparently, to the communication of the Secretary of State for War, which I maintain was most irregular, than you do to the Royal Warrant. The Secretary of State for War endeavoured to lay down conditions upon which you have acted, which were in no way expressed in the Royal Warrant; and have you not taken this action of holding up this surplus simply because of the condition laid down by the Secretary of State for War in that communication to which you have referred?—Undoubtedly.

847. May I ask you this question: if the Royal Warrant had been acted upon in its entirety you would not have had these available assets which you have now; but it is simply in consequence of acting on the communication of the Secretary of State for War, instead of acting on the terms and conditions expressed in this Royal Warrant?—That is so; but if, on the other hand, the fund had been applied, as the honourable Member's question must be followed up logically, to the widows of those men who died in ordinary service every year, the fund would simply have been applied to a favoured few, because it would have been absolutely insufficient to have continued to meet the cases from year to year.

848. Surely it is a favoured few that are getting the advantages now?—But under conditions of war service.

849. But as laid down by the Secretary of State for War, and not as laid down by Her Majesty; he overrides the acts of Her Majesty, and sets up conditions never considered essential by the words of the Royal Warrant?—I think the honourable Member must have lost sight of the words of the Royal Warrant, which says, "Preferential consideration is to be given to the widows and children of soldiers on the married establishment," &c., &c.

850. He says, if the allowances so granted should not absorb the whole of the sum, the balance of the fund should not be appropriated in granting allowances for other than war services, but should be kept in hand as a reserve fund to meet any extraordinary demand; but the Royal Warrant says quite the contrary: "shall be applied in payment of such compassionate, annual, or other allowances to the widows and children or other dependent relatives of soldiers dying on service, or within six months after discharge" (I read this before), "and generally in such manner for the benefit of such widows and children or other dependent relatives of soldiers, dying as aforesaid;" and then come the clauses (a), (b), and (c)?—All Royal Warrants are drawn widely, so as to draw into the

the net all conceivable cases; but anyone who has any experience of Royal Warrants knows, I think, that the Secretary of State for War is bound to give his interpretation of the Royal Warrant. Of course, I am speaking as one who has had 27 years in the Army, and I cannot ignore the experience that I got in it; and I should say that it was obvious that the Commissioners, having been granted this on a Royal Warrant, in which there is a clause that the fund may be taken back any time that the Secretary of State for War chooses to advise Her Majesty so to do, could not ignore the instructions of the Secretary of State for War as conveyed at the very inception of the fund, and on the transfer of the first corpus.

851. I will not press you further on that point, except just once more to ask you whether you admit that the Royal Warrant has not been acted on in its entirety; that you are acting on a letter of the Secretary of State for War which overrides the provisions of the Royal Warrant?—Subject to the provision that "preferential consideration" is to be given in the order stated.

852. Why has it been decided, contrary to the practice of other funds, not to make any allowance to re-married women, seeing that the "Soldiers' Effects Fund" is in what may be called a state of repletion? You do not give the same advantage to re-married widows under this fund as you do in other funds, though you have plenty of assets to justify your doing so?—Because obviously of the enormous contingent demands that may arise at any moment if there was to be an extensive war involving extensive military operations, and consequent possible extensive mortality amongst the soldiers engaged.

853. I may take it that that is in continuation of the policy of allowing these assets to increase to meet contingencies that may or may not arise; that you allow the "Soldiers' Effects Fund" to go on increasing year after year; that you are allowing this fund to increase as it has increased from 1885, when the surplus was 21,974*l.*, to 1894, when there is over 100,000*l.* balance to meet the claims that may be made upon it in the event of our being engaged in war?—Yes.

854. And this process is intended, so far as the Commissioners are concerned, to go on until this war arrives?—With the concurrence of the Secretary of State for War.

855. If this war does not arrive, the fund may go on increasing till it gets to a million?—Very likely it will, if the happy circumstance should continue long enough of there not being a war.

856. You think, in the meantime, there are no further claimants that might be admitted to the benefit of this fund to be found under the terms of this Royal Warrant?—I certainly could not say that, because with reference to the third category, (c) I endeavoured in my previous answer to say that if the fund was to be applied to that category it would only be a favoured few that would get on to the fund, as the numbers every year that died under that category were far too numerous for any such small fund as this, for small it is, after all, in relation to the strength of the Army, and the possible number of widows that are created each year by mortality from ordinary service.

857. The number of widows on the fund now is much less now than at any other period?—That number must go on decreasing.

858. And the assets increasing?—They must go on increasing.

859. With regard to the charge for management of this fund, do you consider that the principle of charging 4 per cent. on the income of each fund is a sound one?—If you turn to paragraph 26 of my Statement, page 17, I think the actual expenditure for 1894 gives you an absolute proof that that figure is as nearly as possible the actual cost, 3·91 per cent., being the cost of the actual office, salaries and expenses.

860. Four per cent.?—Yes, really it is the same thing.

861. Let us see how that principle works out in this particular fund, the "Soldiers' Effects Fund." The number of widows and orphans relieved in 1894, was 164, and the charge for managing 179*l.*, that is more than a pound a head; do you not consider that rather high?—I call the criticising of the management on that basis altogether unreal and illusory; it has no relation whatever to the work that is done in connection with that fund, which cannot be disclosed in the number of people placed upon it. The "Soldiers' Effects Fund" is a fund that brings us continual work; the claims do not get relieved in the shape of pecuniary allowances, but the applicants for relief from the "Soldiers' Effects Fund" continue in a continuous stream, and we relieve them through our educational endowments in affording maintenance and education for their children.

862. In spite of the many applications, the amount paid for allowances in 1894 was only 1,083*l.*?—But I have explained how that is; the widows are decreasing every day.

863. I am not questioning it, I am only stating the fact; so that the charge for management was more than 16 per cent. of this amount?—I contend that that is utterly illusory and unreal; it is an unfair way, if I may put it so, of criticising the management of the Patriotic Fund Commission. The Patriotic Fund Commission must be taken as a whole; it works all these things under one roof, and to separate out the work of each of them upon one basis, and then take it on another basis with regard to another fund is not fair.

864. You do not think it fair to separate out a single fund?—Certainly not to take it per head.

865. Referring to your memorandum of the 30th April, page 18, you will see that you have yourself invited this mode of comparison by showing that the percentage of cost of management of the "Thunderer" Fund, a fund administered separately, is 15·27 on the allowances made?—That is so.

866. I simply adopt the same method of comparison; you take exception to it when applied to the "Soldiers' Effects Fund," but your own argument supports it by applying it to the "Thunderer" Fund; you work it out to apply to the "Thunderer" Fund as 15·27 per cent., and I work it out to this fund to be 16 per cent.; you do not think it fair if I apply it to the "Soldiers' Effects Fund"?—If I were not prepared with an answer to that I think your statement would perhaps have the importance that you attach to it; but the receipts of the "Thunderer" Fund were in that year 799*l.* 11*s.* 11*d.* Our principle of charging is 4 per cent. upon the income, and I therefore thought it was not fair to apply this in the case of the "Thunderer" Fund, and I took it, in this particular instance, merely as illustrating the expenses that were incurred in the management; and I took it, therefore, in the most favourable way for that fund by putting it on to the expenditure and allowances.

867. Now we will pass on to the "Rodriguez" Fund: the Reports since the year 1863 show that the original bequest consisted of a sum of money amounting to 7,380*l.*, which has now grown by accumulations of income to 14,770*l.* I see that, by the Act of 1867, Clause 21, it was directed that this fund should be applied for "the like purposes as the Patriotic Fund"; that is so, is it not?—That is so.

868. But the Commissioners from time to time (according to your statement to the 30th of April 1895, page 6) express their regret that the terms of the will limit them so rigidly that it is difficult to find suitable persons to relieve. Will you please turn to the copy of the will in the 4th Report, page 15. The words are: "My executors will take care that no one shall profit by this succour but such as are really indigent and necessitous." Can you explain how it is that since 1888 the whole of the payments, &c., have been on account of the widows, &c., of officers?—I am not quite sure that it is all widows and orphans of officers, but I think it is; I will not dispute it.

869. Do you mind reading the clause in the will once more; I think some of the Members of the Committee have not quite caught that clause?—It is in my statement: "The limitation by the testator of his bequest to such as are really indigent and necessitous only."

870. "My executors will take care that no one shall profit by this succour but such as are really indigent and necessitous." I ask if you can explain how it happens that the whole of the payments since 1888 have been payments to the widows and orphans of the officers, as I deduce from your own reports?—The explanation is this; that no cases have come to us of those below the rank of officer but what we have been able to relieve either from the Roman Catholic Orphans' Fund or from the Royal Victoria Patriotic Asylum.

871. That is the explanation?—That is the explanation.

872. I have gone carefully over the reports since the first, and cannot find any mention of a payment from this fund that can be actually fixed as an account of a dependent of a non-commissioned officer or soldier or sailor?—I can furnish the Committee with payments to those below the rank of officer.

Mr. Kearley—continued.

873. I could not trace it in the reports?—Very likely.

874. You admit the accuracy of my contention that, notwithstanding this express condition in the will (and you have mentioned, I think, in your evidence that you felt yourselves bound to be governed by the terms of this will) that no one shall profit by this succour but such as are really indigent and necessitous, yet since 1888 the only people who have benefited by this fund are the widows and orphans of officers?—That is so, but there is another condition; it must be war service; and we have had no wars of any extent except the Egyptian Campaign, the cases from which I pointed out were relieved in every single case from the "Soldiers' Effects Fund."

875. Surely, if officers were killed, men were killed also?—But if we relieved them entirely from the "Soldiers' Effects" Fund, what necessity was there to put them on the "Rodriguez" Fund?

Mr. Brodrick.

876. You have just referred to the Egyptian War; on what ground did the Commissioners decide that it was only to apply to prospective and not to retrospective wars?—They explained their reasons for that in the scheme which will be found printed at the 61st page of the Eighth Report; they give in detail their reasons for it; it is in Appendix J of the 8th Report: This is the scheme in which they laid down what they felt was the proper interpretation of the conditions under which they had to administer the trust, and I think that will explain, if I read it in extenso, exactly the position of the Commissioners and why there has been so little application of it. The "Rodriguez" Fund. Extracts from will dated 30th March 1857: "To be applied 'to the succour of the families of English subjects wounded or dying in the wars; and if any individual who shall be considered entitled to this succour shall have no family, then it shall be paid to his nearest relation. My executors will take care that no one shall profit by this succour but such as are really indigent and necessitous.' The Committee consider that the condition 'really indigent and necessitous' excludes: (a) Persons in the receipt of pensions from Government; (b) Allowances from the Patriotic or any other fund; or (c) Of any income from other sources. And wounded men themselves are evidently not contemplated. Therefore the widows and orphans of men wounded (? dying from wounds) or dying in the wars, are the primary objects. Parents or other dependent relatives have a secondary claim. Gratuities are given from Lloyd's Patriotic Fund to wounded men, to the widows and orphans or fathers, mothers, or other dependent relatives of men killed."

877. We have all that before us; the only point I asked you was: Why the Commissioners decided that there was to be no retrospective application?—"The small amount to be periodically distributed precludes any retrospective action."

878. Why did it not exclude any prospective action?—Because there must be an application in the future at any rate, if there was not as regards the past. These are the reasons you asked me for. There is nothing in the will to indicate that the testator contemplated past wars.

879. Or that he contemplated future wars?—Of course you may say that.

880. Does it not occur to you that what Don Rodriguez was probably thinking of was the men who suffered in the original great war, in which England had assisted Spain?—That is obviously not the interpretation that the Commissioners placed upon it.

Mr. Kearley.

881. My point is that there have been plenty of people in wars subsequent whose relatives ought to receive the benefit of this fund?—The answer to that is that the Commissioners laid it down that under the condition of "necessitous and indigent circumstances," any one who was in receipt of benefits from other funds was not eligible. Now, it is in the cognisance of most men that for almost every war there have been special funds raised.

882. You have made a point repeatedly that these funds should be treated separately, and I think you took exception to my view that there should be an aggregation of them, and that the barriers between these funds should be thrown down, and the whole thing treated as a large sum of money available for these purposes, always subject to the conditions of the trusts of particular funds?—I have made no such point in regard to the Rodriguez Fund; on the contrary, the Rodriguez is, by the fact of its being applicable under the Patriotic Fund Act, 1867, to like purposes as the Patriotic Fund, in almost the same category as the Patriotic Fund, which I took out of the category of special funds.

Mr. Bailey.

883. Are any officers' wives on this fund at this present time receiving any pensions at all?—There is no officers' widow on the "Rodriguez" Fund. The whole of the application now being made is for the maintenance and education of orphans under the second and third clauses of the Patriotic Fund Act of 1867.

884. Then there are officers' children?—Officers' children.

885. Are they officers' children who are on this fund the children of officers whose widows are receiving pensions?—I think so.

Mr. Kearley.

886. But I understand that anyone receiving a pension from the State was not eligible for this fund?—Then, again, I answer by pointing out what was in my evidence-in-chief, that the extended application of the Rodriguez Fund sanctioned by the Patriotic Fund Act of 1867 allowed a more liberal interpretation of "necessitous and indigent."

887. "For like purposes as the Patriotic Fund"?—Yes, "for like purposes as the Patriotic Fund."

888. To sum it up, at the present moment only officers will derive benefit from this fund?—Officers' children.

Mr. Kearley—continued.

889. Officers' children, I mean; widows and children?—There is one widow who has no pension of any kind at all.

890. And the Commissioners have not been able to find widows and children of non-commissioned officers and privates who may be described as indigent and necessitous?—With war service.

891. The payments between 1880 and 1887, varying from 26*l.* to 90*l.*, are given generally as grants to orphans; will you give me a definition of the expression "grants to orphans"?—It is educational grants that you are looking at.

Mr. Seale-Hayne.

892. In regard to the Rodriguez Fund, you stated to me that you considered that the term "English subjects" included the whole of the men serving in the native Indian Army. It is on page 13 of your first day's examination: "Certainly any of those you mention would not (be excluded), because they are English subjects; whoever are subjects of the Crown, whatever nationality they may be, would be included"?—That is so.

893. You stated that you found a difficulty in finding people who would benefit by this fund; do you mean to say that amongst the whole English Army, including the Indian troops, you are not able to find claimants for this fund?—I can certainly say that they do not come to us.

Mr. Kearley.

894. To turn to the will once more, there is a clause in which Rodriguez said, "and if any individual who shall be considered entitled to this succour shall have no family, then it shall be paid to his nearest relation." The entitlement consists in his being an English subject wounded or dying in the wars. By the word "families" the testator clearly meant children only; that is the deduction that I draw from that expression?—If he had no family, where do the children come in?

895. I am just quoting the paragraph which says, "and if any individual who shall be considered entitled to this succour shall have no family, then it shall be paid to his nearest relation"; I want to know whether you agree that by the word "families" the testator clearly meant children only?—I think it would be rather difficult to say; the point has never come up. I can only tell you that.

896. The wording of it is very confused?—Yes.

897. I was going to ask you whether you consider that the Commissioners have done all that could reasonably be expected of them to carry out Don Rodriguez' bequest?—I am quite willing to admit that that is a matter of opinion.

898. With reference to the advertising of this fund, you maintain, in fact, that, notwithstanding all the fighting that has been going on during these 35 years, there have not been enough families or dependents of soldiers wounded and dying in the wars who can be described as really "indigent

Mr. Kearley—continued.

"indigent and necessitous" to absorb even the income of Don Rodriguez' bequest. Now, in the Eighth Report, page 39, there is a reference made to the terms of an advertisement which you proposed to insert, to advertise this fund?—It was inserted; the terms of the advertisement are given in the following page.

899. I was not sure whether it was merely a draft?—No, it was actually inserted.

900. This fund has been advertised?—It has been advertised.

901. Is it being advertised at the present time?—No.

Mr. Kearley—continued.

902. Since when have you discontinued advertising it?—I believe the cause of it was the passing of the Act of 1867, appropriating the fund to like purposes as the Patriotic Fund.

903. Since then the fund has been increasing continuously without a break?—Rapidly.

904. And is not being administered, as a matter of fact?—Not being applied; we are administering it; I said in my evidence that we would be only too glad to get any cases to put on.

905. But unfortunately they do not exist?—I do not think they do.

MR. WOODALL IN THE CHAIR.

Colonel JOHN SMITH YOUNG, again called in; and further Examined.

Mr. Kearley.

906. REFERRING once more to the "Soldiers' Effects" fund, with regard to the provision under Clause "C," those that "died from illness directly traceable to fatigue, privation, or exposure in the performance of military duty;" is the Committee to understand that the number eligible is too numerous for all to be relieved?—That is so.

907. Are any of this class being relieved?—None whatever.

908. That is because in your judgment it would be wrong to give the benefits to a favoured few?—Yes; the Commissioners consider that to extend it to the third class would be to, as it were, shut the door after the number that could be borne by the fund were placed upon it; but irrespective of that, as I said in my evidence on the last occasion on which you examined me, the Secretary of State for War gave the Commissioners an intimation, on handing over the fund, that the balance of the fund, after providing for all cases of death by war service, should be retained.

909. We dealt with that last time?—Yes; the reserve fund to meet any extraordinary demand.

910. You hold that to be your justification?—The justification of the Commissioners, yes.

911. The income of the fund is 4,474*l.*, and only 1,083*l.* is expended. Do you hold that you are justified in refusing to do anything under the circumstances for these people that come under Clause "C," even to the extent of giving them gratuities from the fund?—Undoubtedly; under the existence of the policy indicated by the authority whence the fund has been derived.

912. Now, passing on to the Thurlow Fund, which of course is a very small fund; the amount handed over, I think, in 1884 was 500*l.*?—That is so.

913. And this was given "for the benefit of deserving girls;" beyond what the present regulations consist of; that refers to the regulations of the Patriotic Fund, I suppose?—No; the regulations for the Royal Victoria Patriotic Asylum.

Mr. Kearley—continued.

914. The fund practically remains untouched?—Hardly.

915. It amounts to 591*l.* at the present time?—Hardly untouched, however; donations have been made from it from time to time latterly, and they are continuing to be made, but for the reasons given in my evidence in chief—that the cases for which it is considered to be applicable being very few, owing to the resources of the Royal Victoria Patriotic Asylum Endowment Fund being adequate—it has been applied only to the help of those girls whose health has unfitted them for being placed in domestic service.

916. I may take it, the fund amounts to 591*l.*?—That is so.

917. The original sum was 500*l.* Now, as regards the "Rodriguez" Fund, I see that under its terms no one is entitled to profit from it who has a pension or allowance. If you remember, we made it clear last week that only officers' children were on this fund; have none of the officers' widows pensions?—If your question applies to the one widow that is on it at this present moment, she has no pension. If it applies to the mothers of these children for which educational allowances are granted in the fund, they have pensions; but therein comes the extension of the more liberal interpretation of the application of the fund, caused by the authority granted by Parliament in the Act of 1867 to apply it for like purposes to the Patriotic Fund.

918. Yes, but I must remind you that you have justified the non-administration of this fund to its full power, because, by the terms of the trust, only really indigent and necessitous persons were to be on it. Then you admitted later that by the enlargement of the conditions that was not being carried out strictly to the letter; and I see now that we may consider that this granting of allowances to those who have pensions, or to their mothers, which is practically the same thing, thing, is also an enlargement of the original conditions laid down?—Under the powers granted by the Patriotic Fund Act of 1867.

919. Now, I asked you a question the other day about advertising these available funds, and you scarcely thought it was a fair matter that I should put to you?—I do not think I put it as an unfair matter; the advertising.

920. You said, "Is it fair to ask me?"?—If you will look at my answer you will see you interrupted my answer; I did not get an opportunity to complete it.

921. Never mind; that is not much of a point; but I want to direct your attention to that which you stated in another part of your evidence that it was unfortunate that there was not publicity given to the fact that there were these large surpluses?—That is so.

922. Have not the Commissioners the power to advertise the fact that they have these large balances?—Of course, it is a matter of opinion whether this should be done.

923. Will you express an opinion on behalf of the Patriotic Commissioners; I understand you appear by resolution to speak for them?—That is so.

924. We have it that these balances exist, and you lament that publicity is not given to the fact that they do exist. Then, I ask you whether the Commissioners have not the power to give this publicity, so that those who are entitled, or might become recipients of these bounties, might have the knowledge that the funds exist?—I have no difficulty in admitting that they have power to advertise.

925. Well, I will sum it up by asking you whether or no publicity has been given to the fact that these large balances, which are constantly increasing, exist?—I thought I had answered that in my cross-examination, when I said that the greatest publicity was given to all the circumstances, including the fact of large surpluses existing on the various funds, by the process by which the Reports to Her Majesty were laid before Parliament, and were commented on, as they were issued as Parliamentary Papers, in the press every year.

926. I notice that the comments in the press on the last Report you presented to Parliament consisted of referring to the Victoria Fund only, so that the press is not a very reliable medium, if we may take this as an example?—I have comments which apply to a good many more funds than that.

927. However, you deem that to be sufficient publicity?—For present circumstances; I do not say ultimately.

928. Now from the Zervudachi Fund, not a single penny has been spent; you have admitted that, I think, earlier in the evidence?—Yes.

929. I see there are no special conditions attaching to that fund by which you might be hampered in administering it?—None.

930. You have the fund there with practically no handicapping conditions, yet not a single penny of it has been spent?—That is so.

931. Now, passing on to another fund, the "Atalanta" Fund, you describe it as a poor fund?—Originally.

932. Well, originally it amounted to 9,275*l.*, and now it amounts to 7,400*l.*, so that it would be a poor fund still, would it not?—Not in the same sense as I intended to apply the word "poor." What I call a poor fund is one in which at its outset, in regard to the number of recipients that would be entitled to participate in its benefits, the allowances to be granted from the corpus, under an actuarial valuation, would be much below those which the Commissioners have adopted as a scale or standard of relief in the better subscribed funds.

933. I am coming to that point; you have told us that you awarded increases in 1883?—That is so.

934. To those who were beneficiaries; and also again in 1891; can you tell us what increases you made in these respective years?—You will find it in paragraph 27 of my statement, page 19. The original rates, for instance, in 1881 to widows of ordinary and able seamen and second class petty officers were only 2*s.* 6*d.*; in 1883 the ordinary and able seaman was raised to 3*s.* 6*d.*; and in 1891 to 5*s.*

935. I have been looking for that and had not discovered it; at that time there were no allowances to those below the rank of officer from the Admiralty?—None.

936. So that those sailors' widows who were receiving 2*s.* 6*d.*, 3*s.*, and 3*s.* 6*d.* a week must have been almost in a starving condition for some time?—In very poor circumstances indeed.

937. They must have been in very poor circumstances?—But this is to be remembered, that these circumstances governed rather higher rates in the case of mothers of families in the allowances to children.

938. Yes, but on the principle of giving a larger allowance per child?—Per child; that is so.

939. I see that although this was a poor fund, officers' widows who were getting pensions from the Government had a fair share in the fund; they seem to me to get the lion's share, considering it was a poor fund and that so many dependents were only getting 2*s.* 6*d.* a week. Did it never strike the Patriotic Commissioners that it was somewhat hard on the poorer people that the officers' widows should get the lion's share of this small fund; may I give you an example before you answer? There is a widow of a navigating lieutenant; she was getting from the Government a pension of 70*l.* a year, according to your answer to Question 285, and she was getting from this fund 16*l.* per year, whereas the seaman's widow was only getting 6*l.* 10*s.* per year and nothing from Government funds?—The honourable Member will pardon me for pointing out that one of the fundamental principles of the Commissioners in undertaking a fund is to lay the responsibility, so far as the original allowances are concerned, upon those who raise the fund.

940. Yes, I understand that?—These rates were laid down by the committee that raised the fund, not by the Commissioners. The latitude given given to the Commissioners is in the direction of increasing, but it would hardly be justifiable for the Commissioners to decrease allowances which had been fixed by those who had raised the fund.

941. No, I did not ask that quite; I merely wanted you to express an opinion (perhaps you would prefer not to give it) that it seemed rather hard on those people who were getting only half-a-crown and no other allowance, that a large portion of the fund should go to officers' widows who were getting pensions. They were perfectly entitled to participate; I am not questioning that at all?—I can only say that as regards general policy the Commissioners have hardly ever done anything for officers' families beyond the original allowances, and have adopted the policy of increasing the allowances of those below the rank of officer.

942. In regard to the proportions by which this fund was shared by officers and by men, I see the original number of officers' widows was three, and two mothers and 11 children; and that in 1894 the number of widows had risen to five. Now, if we consider the petty officers and men, the number of widows originally on the fund was 24 and 36 children; and now the number of widows belonging to petty officers and men has dropped down in 1894 to 10. There has been a diminution in the number of widows from 24 to 10, so far as men are concerned, and an increase of widows from three to five, so far as the officers are concerned?—It is a mistake. I am quite sure there has been no one put on to the fund in addition (at least, I am almost certain of it), and I think the answer is that there is an error in my table, paragraph 2, by including in it, very likely, the mothers.

943. Does your table show the mothers as well as the five widows?—They ought to have shown as "other dependents"; I fancy that is the explanation.

944. Can you refer me to what is the total of that fund in the way of mothers and widows; five?—Five.

945. Then probably that is an error?—I think it is; it is just one that has crept in very likely in our statistical information; it has escaped my own notice.

946. Perhaps you will take a note just to let us know definitely?—I will take a note of it.

947. This is the only special fund of which it has been found necessary to trench on the capital?—Oh, no; the "Captain" Fund has decreased considerably.

948. The "Captain"; it was originally 39,000*l.*, and has got down now to 32,000*l.* odd?—You must recollect that in the earlier years it decreased considerably; in later years the income has more than sufficed to pay the allowances in consequence of the fund having increased again; but originally the capital had to be trenched on.

949. You have trenched on this capital to the extent of 100*l.* in 1893?—The "Atalanta?"

950. Yes?—Yes.

951. I see now the income equals the expenditure; there is no further intrenchment going on?—I do not know where the honourable

Mr. Kearley—continued.

Member gets that information; the information I gave on page 18 is that the income was 296*l.*, and that the allowances paid out were 330*l.* 12*s.* 3*d.*

952. That is probably an error of mine, then. Anyway, this is a poor fund. Then why not increase these allowances from other funds, considering that those people get nothing from the Admiralty even to this day. Of course, the distributing of the Greenwich Fund was not retrospective?—That is so.

953. So that these people are at a disadvantage, for instance, as compared with those that are on the "Victoria" Fund; those on the "Victoria" Fund get allowances which are larger?—Oh, much larger.

954. Much larger; then they also get the Greenwich Fund?—That is so.

955. Therefore, these people are at a disadvantage as regards the amount they are deriving from charity?—That is so, and the Commissioners themselves pointed out the discrepancy, if I may be allowed to interpolate that.

956. What do you say to the suggestion that these allowances might be increased from the Royal Naval Relief Fund, which is doing nothing?—That is a question of policy which I could hardly answer, and I should think that anyone else could hardly answer, because it would have to be considered by the Commissioners as a body.

957. Has it ever been considered by the Commissioners?—No, for the reasons already given in my evidence in regard to the Royal Naval Relief Fund; that in the correspondence which took place between the Admiralty and the War Office and the Commissioners it was agreed that it should accumulate until the sum reached sufficient, in the opinion of the Commissioners, to enable a general scheme of relief to be adopted.

958. Now the Zulu War Fund: you told us that the original allowance for widows of private soldiers, which, I suppose, constitute the great bulk of the beneficiaries of this fund, was 3*s.* 6*d.* a week?—That is so.

959. And that no increase was made to this rank until 1892?—One thousand eight hundred and eighty-three.

960. Until 1892?—One thousand eight hundred and eighty-three. If you will look at page 11 you will see this: "For the widows and children of those below the rank of officer, increases, however, were awarded in 1883 and 1892, and the scale now is as follows."

961. The Zulu War Fund?—Yes, the Zulu War Fund.

962. I will refer to your Answer 256?—If you will look at my answer to 255 you will see: "The answer to your question will be found on page 8 of the 31st Report, which gives the increases which were given before 1883."

963. Then there were increases made in 1892?—Yes.

964. I see, in looking over the reports in 1884, the original number of widows had sunk to 43. In 1886 the number of widows left on the fund was only 34?—And now it is 25.

965. Yes; and the surplus had increased in that that year to 9,000*l.* In 1889 the number of widows was only 30, and the surplus was 12,500*l.*?—That is so.

966. Do not you think that the Commissioners might have increased the allowance at an earlier date than 1892.—You see there was an interval from 1883 to 1892, without an increase; do not you think it would have been prudent in the face of those augmentations in the surplus to have made that increase sooner than they did?—Well, it is a question of what shape the increase should have taken. In all the funds which are well subscribed, there is a liability taken for the restoration to full allowance on second widowhood. The number that re-married in the Zulu War Fund was very much larger in proportion, I should say (speaking off the book) than in any other fund, and that I think retarded the question of how best to deal with the surplus (a large surplus it may be), which did exist for a series of years; consequently the liability for restoration to full allowance of widows who had re-married was not undertaken until 1893.

967. What was the increase made in 1883?—The allowance was originally 3*s.* 6*d.* a week for all widows of men below the rank of officer (non-commissioned officers and all), and in 1883 the rates for non-commissioned officers' widows were raised; for corporals' widows to 4*s.*; sergeants' widows to 4*s.* 6*d.*; colour sergeants' and sergeant majors' widows to 5*s.*

968. Then there was no increase to those receiving 3*s.* 6*d.* a week?—None.

969. That was my point. I thought I was right on that. The increase was to those holding higher rank than the private?—That is so.

970. The poorest received no increase whatever?—Until July 1892.

971. Until 1892. So far as the increase in 1883 went, it does not touch the point that the poorest received no increase until 1892?—The lowest rank. I would not say necessarily the poorest.

972. We will assume that those holding the lowest rank, so far as pensions were concerned, were the poorest, they received the lowest sum of money?—They received the lowest sum of money.

973. Now I want to draw your attention again to these facts, that in 1884 Mr. Finlaison showed a surplus of 6,178*l.*, in 1886 the surplus had risen to 9,000*l.*, in 1889 the surplus had risen to 12,500*l.*, and that, so far as these poor people were concerned, they got no increase in pension until 1892; but that in 1883, when you deliberately made an increase in the allowances, you excluded the private soldier from any increase?—Well; the allowance of 3*s.* 6*d.* a week was one that had been regarded in other funds as a fair allowance at that time for the widow of a private soldier.

974. And that continued to be considered a fair allowance until 1892?—And is so considered in connection with the Soldiers' Effects Fund and the Greenwich Hospital Fund.

975. What has the Greenwich Hospital Fund to do with this?—Because the scale was fixed by joint consideration of a committee which sat as to allowances.

Mr. Kearley—continued.

976. The Soldiers' Effects Fund?—No; they borrowed it from the Greenwich Hospital scale.

977. But the Greenwich Hospital question has nothing whatever to do with the administration of the Patriotic Fund?—It had, because it arose out of the circumstances which were considered in the correspondence in Parliamentary Paper C. 2956, undoubtedly.

978. Still, you are not here to speak of Greenwich Hospital at all?—No, but I know the circumstances under which it arose.

Commander Bethell.

979. You mention it by way of comparison, I suppose?—The scale was agreed as a scale for both Greenwich Hospital Fund and Soldiers' Effects Fund.

Mr. Kearley.

980. Agreed between whom?—Agreed between authorities who were consulted as to what the scale of allowances should be.

981. That has not been adhered to as far as the Patriotic Commissioners are concerned?—In the Soldiers' Effects Fund it has.

982. But not generally. The Patriotic Commissioners have powers to increase these allowances; they are not bound by any agreement which may have been arrived at between the War Office and the Admiralty and the Patriotic Commissioners in consultation; you are not bound down by that agreement in any shape or form?—Certainly not in this fund that you are speaking of just now, the Zulu War Fund?

983. Or in any fund?—No.

984. So I think the introduction of the allowances made by Greenwich is rather calculated to mislead some of the Members of the Committee, who may not understand quite clearly the relations of Greenwich to the Patriotic Fund?—The very opposite is my intention.

985. I am quite sure of that?—It was not to mislead, but rather to point to the fact that the scale had been considered by authorities representing both the Army and the Navy.

986. Then, passing on to this question of the Zulu War Fund; so far as the question of the poorest receiving no increase of pension until 1892 is concerned, I find that in 1889 the income of the fund actually exceeded the expenditure, and has done so ever since?—That is so.

987. That is the Zulu War Fund?—That is so.

988. Now I must press this point, because, to my mind, it is almost convincing proof that the Commissioners have failed (in my opinion, at all events) to appreciate their position. Here is a case, so far as regards these people, where for years you have had funds in hand expressly given for the purpose of relieving a number of women whose husbands were killed in the public service, and yet you have allowed these people for years to continue on this small pittance?—If I may say so, the question prejudges the whole question of policy and administration. In my statement, on page 11, I pointed out that in 1893 the further important liability was undertaken that re-married women on becoming widows again, and being in necessitous circumstances, may be restored to full allowance. I said also: "It is also probable that when the widows of those below the rank of officer reach 60 years of age, their allowance will be increased." Now, in the surplus assets which the honourable Member has referred to, none of those liabilities have been estimated for at all, and the widows of the Zulu War Fund have as yet not reached the advanced age at which we grant increased allowances owing to not being able to do something towards their own maintenance.

989. And anyway, after making this allowance finally in 1889, Mr. Finlaison still shows that there is a surplus of 12,598*l.*; and the present position of the fund, I think, is this: that there are only eight widows of officers, and nine orphans (of course, the children will soon be going off the fund), and only 25 widows of non-commissioned officers and men, and that the income of the fund now actually exceeds expenditure by 365*l.* per year; and this increasing of the assets is likely to go on. You mention the fact that there will be an age allowance at 60; but the number of widows left on the fund is so small that the liability of this fund in this respect can surely be calculated?—But there will be a restoration of full allowance to those who become widows again, of whom there are 54.

990. As regards these widows that will become eligible to restitution of allowances, you tell us that this will not be given as a matter of right, but only to such widows as satisfy the Commissioners that they are in necessitous circumstances?—That is so.

991. That was decided in 1893?—That is so.

992. So that it is not a fact that all these widows will be liable to restitution, but only those that are in necessitous circumstances?—Well, my experience is that they will all come under that category.

993. Is that so?—Yes. There are very few of the re-married women who do not fulfil that condition, very few.

994. Can you give us any experience to justify that opinion. Have you had any applications up to date?—Yes; but I would refer to the experience in the Patriotic Fund; the Patriotic Fund is an analogous experience, because it is from the same class.

995. I think, if you do not mind, I would rather keep to this particular fund. You mentioned the other day that you had had one or two applications, or that you thought you had had one or two, but that you would refer and let us know. Have you had an opportunity of investigating to see how many applications you have had up to date?—I have not; I did not remember that I had undertaken to do that.

996. If you see your answer to No. 262 you will find that that is so?—I did not say I was going to get the information.

997. Never mind; it is not a very important point?—I merely gave the fact that I thought there were one or two.

998. However, you have told us you have records of the fact that there are 54 widows remaining?—That 54 of the original number had re-married.

999. And you estimated that 40 to 50 might ultimately become a liability to the fund by reason of widowhood?—I do not think I gave any estimate; in fact, I am sure I did not.

1000. Will you turn to your Answer 244?—Yes. I beg your pardon; I did.

1001. You estimated 40 or 50 additional, and you consider that a very heavy liability?—I do.

1002. Allow me to ask you on what ground you calculate those possible 40 or 50 coming back on this fund; it seems to me an unreasonable estimate of a possible liability?—I think that it is very improbable that many, if any, of the 54 will have died, and consequently I think that it is not at all unreasonable to say that out of the 54, 40 or 50 may come back upon us.

1003. It is not a question of the widow dying; it is a question of the husband predeceasing her?—I am quite aware of that, but it is a question in the first instance of whether the woman survives her husband.

1004. Naturally; but you estimate that out of 54 widows that are liable to become a charge, 40 or 50 will certainly come back. That seems to me to be a very high estimate indeed?—It may be so, but I do not think I should be blamed for taking a high estimate in regard to any liability. It is infinitely better to be safe in regard to the retention of assets than to dissipate them on the presumption that you may not have a high liability.

1005. Still I would remind you that there are definite bases on which such calculations are estimated. I am advised that an insurance company taking over this liability would actuarially estimate exactly the possible liability of those married women becoming widows, and that the most outside estimate, leaving the safest possible margin, would not exceed 50 per cent.?—Well, of course the honourable Member is in possession, no doubt, of professional opinion upon that subject. I did not pretend to give an opinion as a professional opinion; I simply gave it as regards the experience that one has in the Patriotic Fund, that the re-married women survive their husbands, and that we may have 40 or 50 widows come back to us for restoration of full allowance. It may be an outside estimate.

1006. I think it is very outside indeed?—From my point of view, I do not think I am to be blamed for giving an outside estimate.

1007. I will not question your point of view, but I think it should be forced on the attention of the Committtee that there are actuarial bases well recognised and defined upon which all these calculations should proceed. If the Patriotic Commissioners do not proceed upon those lines their estimates are practically worthless for the purpose of considering what the available assets of these various funds are?—The Commissioners do proceed upon actuarial lines; as a matter of fact, a re-valuation of the Zulu War Fund is due this year, and consequently the actuarial valuation for this new liability will take place. It has not taken place hitherto for the simple reason that the Commissioners saw no necessity, in view of the large surplus that existed, to ascertain actuarially the liability at the moment of deciding to incur the new liability.

1008. That perfectly satisfies me, if I may ask

ask you this question; this estimate is not actuarially calculated?—Not yet.

1009. It is simply a matter of opinion of the Commissioners, not backed up by any professional opinion?—My own opinion, please; I would not even commit the Commissioners to it; it was entirely an individual opinion in answer to your question.

1010. Now, you mentioned that some of these widows have disappeared, I presume gone abroad?—Well, of course, I cannot say that.

1011. You say, in your answer to Question 245, that some of these widows have disappeared?—I say that, in the case of a fund like the Zulu War Fund, they disappear; that is to say, that when the Zulu War Fund was originally started, and the conditions of administration laid down, one of them was that widows who re-married should not be eligible for restoration, and consequently as they received no half allowance as in the other funds we had no touch with them, and consequently they disappeared.

1012. Then, as regards the liability on this fund of these re-married widows, it would surely be possible for Mr. Finlaison, who I see has allowed 1,200*l.* for contingencies, to say what further sums ought to be taken for this liability?—And he will be called upon to say so.

1013. Considering that this surplus was augmenting year by year, ought not the Patriotic Commissioners to have invited him to have done that some years ago, so that the widows of these private soldiers might have received an augmentation of their pension. They only receiving 3*s.* 6*d.* from the commencement of the fund, a totally inadequate sum, until 1892?—To answer the question intelligently I should have to go back to what was the number of widows on the fund in 1883. The honourable Member is endeavouring to place on the Commissioners a responsibility for increasing the allowances to the lowest rank upon the assumption, apparently, that the number of widows at that date would have entitled them to such increase; I could not say off-hand what were the proportions in the various ranks at 1883, without going back to the figures of that date.

1014. Proportions of what?—The various ranks.

1015. Do you mean officers?—No, I mean those below the rank of officer.

1016. What the rank was?—No, the numbers.

1017. The numbers of each particular rank?—Yes.

1018. You could not say how many privates there were?—Not off the book.

1019. Not off-hand?—Not off the book.

1020. Still in 1883 you increased the pensions of the non-commissioned officers and men, everybody's except the privates?—That is so; but it might turn out (I do not say that it will) that the numbers would not, in the opinion of the Commissioners at that time, have allowed of the increase.

1021. Now we will pass on to the "Eurydice" Fund; I see in this fund there was never any question raised as to the policy of giving re-married women half allowance; it was done at once?—That is so.

1022. In many of these funds, at some period in their history, it has been decided to give re-married women half allowance?—Only in the Zulu War and the "Atalanta" Funds.

1023. But in the "Eurydice" Fund it was given without question?—It was required by the deed.

1024. I notice that on this fund there are several naval officers who were looking after the administration of it at the time of its formation. I suggest that it was owing to the fact of those naval officers being on that fund that that provision was put in the trust deed?—On the contrary, I state emphatically that it was following simply the precedent of the Patriotic Fund, which had existed since 1854.

1025. Then why did not these other funds follow this precedent?—The "Captain" Fund did.

1026. To give half allowance?—Yes, on re-marriage.

1027. There are some funds (I think you mentioned one or two just now) where that policy was not followed out?—Because of the paucity of the fund to bear it according to actuarial valuation when the fund was handed over to the Commissioners.

1028. That would be the reason?—That is the reason.

1029. I do not see that there are any Army officers at all on the Commission who can be said to have any real active connection with the service at the present time?—That, of course, is a matter that only the advisers of Her Majesty can accept responsibility for.

1030. But the Patriotic Commissioners are the advisers of Her Majesty to the extent of adding additional Patriotic Commissioners, are they not?—Certainly not.

1031. Is it the Government of the day?—It is the Government of the day.

1032. Do not you think it would have a beneficial effect upon the administration of military funds, such as the Zulu War Fund, for example, if military officers were admitted on to the Patriotic Fund?—All I can say is this, that the military officers that are on the Commission take a most active interest and a continuous interest in the administration of this and other military funds.

1033. Can you tell us when this increase from 5*s.* to 6*s.* was made in the "Eurydice" Fund?—The "Eurydice" Fund follows the Patriotic Fund.

1034. Was there not an increase from 5*s.* to 6*s.* made in the "Eurydice" Fund?—Following the Patriotic Fund.

1035. It is referred to in your statement of 30th April, page 9?—That is following exactly the Patriotic Fund.

1036. Was there not an increase made in that fund, an increased allowance from 5*s.* to 6*s*?—Yes.

Mr. Kearley—continued.

1037. That is the question I asked you?—But following exactly the course followed in regard to the Patriotic and the "Captain" Funds.

1038. In what year was the increase made; that is the question?—I think it was in 1892.

1039. In 1889 the income of this fund became equal to the expenditure, and in 1892 nearly a hundred was added to the capital, and about the same amount since; but in 1893, looking at the accounts, I find that the funds there shown as being 14,567*l.*, in 1894 appear to have diminished to 14,186*l.* Can you account for this?—Yes.

1040. Now that diminution is not represented by expenditure. I want to know if you can give us an explanation of how that diminution comes about?—If you will turn to the capital account at pages 34 and 35 of the last report, you will see that 7,234*l.* of Colonial Securities were sold out and that those were re-invested in securities of the nominal value of 6,814*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.*

1041. I assumed that that was it. The fact is that you have sold stock and purchased new investments at a premium, but you only show them in your account at face value?—That is so.

1042. Then is not this apparent diminution of capital fallacious. You pay a premium for this stock, but you take it into your assets at its face value?—There is nothing fallacious about it, because it is actual.

1043. I suggest to you that it is rather likely to mislead and give the idea that the assets of the fund are diminishing instead of increasing?—Well, that is, I should say, a most prejudiced view to take, because the simplicity of the account explains exactly how the transaction arose; and I may amplify that by saying that it is the result of a financial policy which the Commissioners have adopted in consequence of an opinion that the investments of the Commission generally in regard to several funds is, in regard to the proportion in which they are in Colonial Stocks, one which should be remedied by the reduction of that proportion, and by the re-investment of the Colonial Stocks sold, in home securities. One result of that will undoubtedly be that the income derivable from the capital will be less in the future than it has been in the past.

1044. You have sold out stock at a premium; consequently you will have more funds to invest; and although the rate per cent. may be less, the net result will surely not be less?—Surely, when the character of the stocks is taken into account. 4 per cent. Colonial Stocks are at about the same price as the 3 per cent. stocks in which we have reinvested.

1045. Then why did you sell out?—For the reason I have just given.

1046. I did not quite catch that reason?—That the proportion of investment in Colonial Stocks was considered to be unduly large.

1048. Now, I will pass on to the Royal Naval Relief Fund. You give an explanation in your evidence of the non-administration of this fund; you say it was agreed between the Commissioners, the War Office and the Naval Committee (that is, the committee I assume, that raised the fund) that there should be no distribution until such amount had accumulated as in the opinion of the Commissioners would enable the fund to be satisfactorily administered for purposes of general relief; that is to say, if a case is not specially provided for by public subscription, or from other sources?—Yes.

1049. Then, that was an explanation or justification for the non-administration of this fund; but I want to point out to you that there was a Royal Commission after that (on the 7th June 1875) which dealt with this fund only, and the fund was then made available for the immediate relief of any special objects of destitution?—But the honourable Member has omitted to notice my information in regard to the creation of the fund. It was not until 1879 that there was any corpus from the fund, and that was created by a sum of 2,095*l.* 3*s.* 8*d.*, raised by the committee for the relief of the sufferers by the explosion which took place on board Her Majesty's ship "Thunderer," being transferred to the Commissioners to form part of the Royal Naval Relief Fund.

1050. I am quite aware of that?—I ought to have said 3,150*l.* in the previous year from the "Eurydice."

1051. What year was the "Eurydice"?—1878.

1052. And you contend that the Royal Naval Relief Fund, which I understand to have been formed about 1872, had no funds until 1879?—Until 1878, it was.

1053. Then what was this Royal Commission doing in June 1875, when it was dealing with this fund only?—The Royal Commission was the outcome of the correspondence which had taken place, resulting from the action of the managing committee of the "Captain" Fund, which gave voice to a feeling which, as I have said, had always existed in the Navy, for the creation of a general fund for the relief of those cases of death by accident which did not attract public philanthropy.

1054. But I do not see that you have displaced my point in any way. You made a certain statement in your evidence to account for the non-administration of the fund; my point is, although I see that the fund only had a corpus in 1878, that under the provisions of the Royal Commission in 1875 this fund (whenever it became a fund) was made available for immediate relief, whereas you laid it down that it was only to be administered under certain conditions?—The correspondence which took place, to which I have referred, showed conclusively that in the opinion of those who transferred the original amount amount, and who had led to the issue of the Commission of 1875, it was not desirable to grant any relief from this fund until it had accumulated to such an extent as, in the opinion of the Commissioners, would enable a scheme of general relief to be framed.

1055. That was the correspondence?—Yes.

1056. Do I understand that you dispute the fact that the Royal Commission gave powers, so that the fund could be made available for immediate relief?—I say this, that the Royal Commission was simply the instrument for authorising the Commissioners to receive contributions towards the creation of a Royal Naval Relief Fund.

1057. And it was decided that the case of officers should not be considered until sufficient funds had been received, but that only those of seamen, marines, and so on, who might die on active service should be considered, giving preference to the relatives of those who may lose their lives in action, from falling from aloft, or from drowning; that is so, I believe?—That is so.

1058. I think the reports clearly show that since 1879 only widows from the "Thunderer" accident have been relieved until the year 1893?—That was so.

1059. When, strangely enough, I find that one dependant of an officer was put on the fund, that the only other dependant put on the fund, in spite of that express provision, was the dependant of an officer. You lay it down that the case of an officer is not to be considered at all until sufficient funds have been received, but that seamen and marines are to have the preference; and I find in the following Report that the very first outside case put on this fund was that of an officer?—Well, it is a so-called officer.

1060. Is it the case of an officer?—No, that is a warrant officer.

1061. That is a commissioned officer to a certain extent?—No, any naval officer will correct you as to that.

1062. I think I can answer that myself?——

1063. Is not this man a chief warrant officer?—No, this is a gunner or carpenter.

1064. He was a chief warrant officer?—No.

1065. Then why do you describe him as an officer at all?—Simply from an old-established practice which obtained in the original Patriotic Fund, where the warrant officers, gunners, and carpenters were placed under the head of officers.

1066. Then this is a warrant officer below the rank of "chief"?—Yes.

1067. And he has not the honorary rank of officer?—That is so.

1068. Then it is an error to so describe this case?—Hardly; but the practice referred to accounts for it being under the head of officer.

1069. I see the average payment from this fund the last six years has been about 35*l.*, and the income has been about 310*l.*?—That is so.

1070. Am I accurate in that?—I think I can easily admit it; it has been going on increasing for the reasons I have given.

Mr. Kearley—continued.

1071. I see the amount disbursed in 1889 was 35*l.*; in 1890, 33*l.*; in 1891, 33*l.*; in 1892, 33*l.*; in 1893, 36*l.*; and in 1894, 69*l.*?—That is so.

1072. All the while the assets had been increasing, taking the periods from 1884 to 1894, that was a feature of the fund, that the income had not been distributed?—That is so.

1073. And the assets have been largely increasing?—It has been agreed that that was the policy to be followed; that the fund should accumulate.

1074. Now, with a view to increase this fund, I find that officers and men, especially officers of the Navy, were to be invited to make annual subscriptions to this fund, and the public generally was to be applied to?—The Commissioners specifically declined to be the medium for undertaking that duty.

1075. Is that explained anywhere in the report?—It is recorded in the very first onset.

1076. Then nothing has been done in that direction?—Nothing has been done by anyone else, I believe, and the Commissioners would not undertake that duty.

1077. They would not undertake that responsibility. The Commissioners are in no sense a collecting body?—Since 1886 the responsibility has been placed upon them by the Act of 1886, from time to time to ask and receive contributions for the benefit of widows and orphans of the Navy and Army.

1078. As to the policy of waiting to administer these funds until they become what you describe, I think, as "satisfactory," can you tell us how often that question has been before the Patriotic Commissioners?—In the 21st Report, paragraph 26, you will find there is a reference to this subject; but the great difficulty that governs the administration of the Royal Naval Relief Fund is undoubtedly the creation of other funds for identical objects; the Greenwich Hospital Fund (which takes every case of death by drowning and accident since 1882), and last year the creation of a fund eight or nine times as great as the Royal Naval Relief Fund; I refer to the Royal Naval Exhibition Fund.

1079. Now, harking back for a moment to the question of the Commissioners not having attempted to get outside subscriptions, I see in your statement on page 10 (of the 30th April) you say: "The Commissioners have endeavoured to obtain accessions to the contributions" to this fund "to enable them to devise some scheme of general relief," but without success?—That was by applying to the Admiralty.

1080. You applied for the Greenwich Funds?—We did not at all indicate the source, but we referred to the pledge that the Lord of the Admiralty had given in the correspondence which I referred to in the Parliamentary Paper "C. 2956" to supplement the funds at the disposal of the Commissioners by funds which were at the disposal of the Admiralty; it was not of course for the Commissioners to indicate the exact source.

1081. You mean the only endeavour that has been made was the application to the Admiralty; you have made no public request?—For the reason I have given the Commissioners laid that down at the outset as a duty that they could not undertake.

1082. As regards this policy of waiting to administer until the fund was satisfactory, has it ever been considered by the Patriotic Commissioners how far the surpluses of the purely naval funds could be made available?—I may say that the subject is continually under review in connection with the policy which has been laid down by the Legislature and by the Government of the day in Section 4 of the Patriotic Fund Act of 1881; and, as I answered before in reply to a similar question, it is a question as to the time at which, in each fund, to deal with the surplus otherwise than as a resource for the maintenance of the allowances of the particular fund, and in regard to the Patriotic Fund the Commissioners have this year come to the conclusion that as it has been 40 years in existence and all the women are becoming aged, the provisions of Section 4 might well be put in force by Parliament authorising the Commissioners to widen the application of the Patriotic Fund.

1083. I suppose all that discussion will appear on your minutes?—There is actually (three or four years ago) an entry on the minutes of the Commissioners to the effect that it was desirable to apply for the supplementary commission indicated in Section 4 of the Patriotic Fund Act of 1881, but they had no sooner come to that conclusion than another influence determined the postponement of any further steps, and that was the question of the proportion of investments in colonial securities, and they passed a resolution then that the proportion should be largely reduced; and steps were about to be taken when, in May 1893 (as those are aware who notice such matters), an extensive fall took place in the value of colonial securities; and it is of the first importance in connection with the subject that the honourable Member is dealing with now, as I understand him, namely, the detachable surplus as he considers of each fund, to have regard to this. I hold a statement before me which I prepared in 1893 to show the depreciation in colonial securities held by the Commission to the extent of 340,000*l.*, and the figures of depreciation by May 1893 are these: Under the par value, 25,420*l.*; under the purchase value, 26,806*l.*; and, what is far more important, under the actuarial valuation of only as recent a date as the 31st December 1892, 21,513*l.*; showing that the surpluses of a given time cannot, while the securities are of that fluctuating nature (such as those colonial securities have undoubtedly shown themselves to be) be regarded as permanent surpluses.

1084. Is there nothing to be shown on the credit side in that direction in connection with your other securities. There has been a falling off and depreciation in colonial securities, but surely there has been an appreciation of some of your other securities?—Undoubtedly; but the other securities are in proportion very much smaller in amount than the amount held in colonial securities; hence the adoption of the precaution by the Commissioners that before dealing in an acute sense with surpluses, especially the funds transferred to them under special trust-deeds, they should see to their investment in home securities.

Mr. Kearley—continued.

1085. Passing on, you have referred to the Royal Naval Fund, the Exhibition Fund, once or twice?—I have.

1086. Did you make an application for that fund to be handed over to you?—It has never been the policy of the Commissioners to apply for any fund.

1087. Excepting to the Admiralty for the Greenwich Funds?—Not "for the Greenwich Funds;" we applied to the Admiralty to fulfil the policy which the First Lord of the Admiralty of the day had agreed was the policy which the Commissioners were to follow out, as in Parliamentary Paper "C. 2956."

1088. The principle adopted by the Royal Naval Fund, I understand, is to spend every penny of their income in relieving cases so far as they can?—I think the honourable Member must be under a misapprehension, for the accounts for the year which has just closed do not show that.

1089. You have the accounts there?—I have the accounts.

1090. With regard to this fund, you attempt to show that the management costs 10 per cent. of the expenditure?—I do not "attempt" to show it; it was in answer to a question as to what the expenses were that I extracted the items shown in this account.

1091. Then you really show it?—I do; but I did not "attempt" to do it.

1092. I did not intend to use the word "attempt" in any offensive sense at all; you show that it costs 10 per cent. of the expenditure?—Yes, in answer to a question I do that.

1093. On the same basis, the Royal Naval Relief Fund costs 23 per cent.?—Quite; that is perfectly true.

1094. Now I want to ask you a few questions with regard to the inquiry of 1881, the inquiry that was instituted, I believe, at the instance of the Government of the day, which resulted in the correspondence with the War Office which we have here in the shape of a Parliamentary Return?—"C. 2956."

1095. "C. 2956," yes. The proposals set forth in one of the letters were to dissolve the Patriotic Commission, among others?—On the contrary; the Ministry came to the conclusion that it could not be dissolved.

1096. Finally; but the proposals in the letter before the final determination was arrived at, were to dissolve the Patriotic Commission; it is clearly set forth in the letter?—A proposal had been made in a previous letter from the War Office, dated 17th March, to that effect.

1097. That is so?—But not in this letter.

1098. The outcome of the inquiry had been that they felt it would be a judicious thing to dissolve the Patriotic Commissioners?—I should say that is exactly the opposite of what the outcome was; the outcome is here, Letter No. 7, from War Office, June 1881.

1099. In the letter of 17th March?—That is not the outcome; that is only a stage in the proceedings; the outcome is what is in this letter of June 1881.

1100. I will

Mr. Kearley—continued.

1100. I will take it as being a stage?—It was an idea.

1101. A "stage" in the correspondence which clearly indicated that they deemed it advisable to dissolve the Patriotic Commission?—It was an idea.

1102. And their proposal was, or their suggestion, at the same time, at this stage, was, was it not, to hand over to Greenwich and Chelsea the payment of pensions with a sufficient appropriation of funds (from your funds, of course), and they also pointed out that the residue of these funds could more beneficially be applied by direct relief to widows than in the education of the children. Do you follow that in the letter?—I see a paragraph to that effect.

1103. And Mr. Childers (I think it was) stated that he was prepared to prepare a scheme and submit it to the Treasury, so that the surplus funds might be administered, and also to ask the Treasury to make additional grants to form this general fund that you deem it a responsibility of the Patriotic Commissioners to form at some future time?—Yes, but the concluding paragraph of the letter puts the whole crux of the question: "If such a scheme could be established"; and the Ministry came to the conclusion that it could not be established.

1104. Where do you find that?—In the concluding paragraph of the letter from which you have just been quoting, the 17th March, page 10: "If such a scheme could be established"; there is the crux of the whole thing.

1105. "All the existing trusts of the Patriotic Fund might be handed over to the Secretary of State for War and the First Lord of the Admiralty, when the Royal Commission is dissolved"?—Exactly.

1106. "The two schools are closed, the children now there being provided for elsewhere, and the whole of the remaining property of the fund is handed over to the Government"?—Quite so; but that is not the crux of the whole thing.

1107. "An Act of Parliament would, of course, be necessary to give effect to these arrangements": Do you think I am wrong in suggesting that at that moment that was practically the determination they had arrived at?—"If such a scheme could be established"; but I would put it: what is the good of referring to a proposal which was absolutely abandoned in the very same correspondence from the same authority?

1108. Do you claim that that abandonment was occasioned by the fact that they found the scheme impracticable?—Undoubtedly; they acknowledge so in the letter.

1109. Where; can you refer me to the paragraph?—"The deputation pointed out that the Commissioners were charged with the legal custody of several funds raised for particular objects, besides the original funds, and Mr. Childers and Lord Northbrook agreed that this created a great difficulty in carrying out the suggestion that the work of the Commission might now be finally wound up."

1110. Where is that?—Page 15, the final letter of the Parliamentary Paper you are quoting from.

1111. The letter of June, 1881?—Yes.

1112. You stated in your evidence that these difficulties which gave rise to this investigation and correspondence were caused by too much generosity in the application of the funds; you have given that in evidence?—That is pretty nearly what I said; yes. I rather limited it to the admission that the institution of the boys' school was a mistake.

1113. But that is not what the War Office said, the people who carried on the inquiry; they did not attribute this to too much generosity in the application of the funds?—Well, that is a matter of opinion. They undoubtedly stated that the endowment of the boys' school was not justified by the state of the assets and the liabilities which had been at that time incurred.

1114. Of course, I am perfectly aware that you were not connected with the Patriotic Fund at that time; but I suggest that mismanagement was the cause of those difficulties; it was not a question of too much generosity; it was a question of mismanagement?—I have no doubt that "too much generosity" might by some have applied to it the word "mismanagement."

1115. For instance, the endowment for the boys' school was found to be 60,000*l.* too little, with the result that that transformed the apparent surplus of 68,000*l.* into a deficit of 38,000*l.*, as shown in your report. Then, I think, they pointed out that the school cost 4,000*l.* a year over and above the interest on the endowment, and that the cost of management of the fund and school was 4,000*l.* a year, which would equal 20 per cent. of the then income; all these things were pointed out at that time?—Those and other things were pointed out.

1116. When Mr. Finlaison was here the other day he referred to an idea which he said was in the air to establish a sanitary establishment at Margate?—Well, I think he was hardly in a position to put it exactly in those words; but the fact existed that for the children who required a change of air a sanatorium did exist at Margate, and you will find entries in the accounts from time to time of the maintenance of that establishment. But Mr. Finlaison, you must recollect, is not a servant of the Commission in any way whatever, and he would not have any information on such a point as that.

1117. Now, I will pass to the final fund I wish to deal with, that is, the "Victoria" Fund; you have certain general conditions laid down; I think they were laid down in 1854 and 1855 by Captain Fishbourne and Lieutenant Colonel Lefroy; how far are you justified in treating the "Victoria" dependent on the lines laid down in that paper?—We do not treat them on the lines laid down in that paper.

1118. You do not?—Not at all.

1119. Presently I shall read you a letter that you have written to one of the dependents of the "Victoria" that rather gave me to suppose you were treating them on those lines?—Very well.

1120. But you do not claim that the dependents that come to you, attached to any fund, are to be treated on the lines expressed in this paper?—The very first conditions that the Commissioners have to observe are the administrative conditions which are contained in each deed.

1121. Of course I admit that for the Patriotic Fund it was necessary to make some safeguarding provisions, the rate of death and disaster was very large, and at the time you drew up those conditions the war had not concluded; therefore you were quite justified in laying down the rules; but I had held the opinion until you corrected me that you treated the beneficiaries of these modern funds in the same way and on the same conditions as those laid down for you upon which to administer that Patriotic Fund?—Certainly not the "Victoria."

1122. No, but some of the funds?—I should say certainly, because the conditions of the funds placed them exactly on the same conditions as those of the Patriotic Fund.

1123. Then there would be no trust deed probably in those funds to which you are referring?—There would be, but a trust deed in such a particular would hardly enter into detail.

1124. Now there was nothing in the appeal that was made by the Duke of Cambridge to convey to the public the idea that there would be any restrictions enforced on the beneficiaries?—I should say there could be no intention in any such appeal to place any restrictions or indications of conditions at all. The intention was to appeal, through the Lord Mayor, to the generosity of the public in accordance with the provisions of the Act of 1886 purely and simply.

1125. I think I shall prove to you that you do put restrictions on those people. My point is, that the public gave the money to be distributed among these people without any restrictions; that they were to have the money that was subscribed, every penny of it; the whole of the corpus was to be expended. I think if I read this letter that the Duke of Cambridge wrote to the Lord Mayor (which of course gave rise to the fund) you will see that it is implied there, if not set forth in words, that whatever was raised was to be utilised for the "Victoria" people. That has not been the feature of the other funds. We see clearly from your reports that those funds have not been expended for the benefit of those for whom they were raised?—They have been expended entirely for the benefit of those for whom they were raised as yet.

1126. At the time that the last beneficiary dies, for instance, on the "Captain" fund (the "Captain" fund will not expire with the last beneficiary) there will be a huge surplus. There is a large surplus now?—That remains to be seen.

1127. At the outset of the Victoria Fund the allowances that youmade were not on the basis of those you are making now. You gave widows of able seamen 3*s.* 6*d.* a week, and these rates were fixed three months after the disaster. How do you justify starting to give these people such small sums of money?—Simply by the fact that it was a temporary expedient pending the preparation of a scheme in accordance with the corpus of the fund and the liabilities that it might be thought necessary to place upon it.

1129. Perhaps we shall refer directly, to some correspondence that took place in the "Times" (a letter of Lord Nelson's), I will come to that directly. My point is that this original scheme was not a provisional scheme, and was not intended to be so. I say that with all deference to your opinion. Of course I accept that; but I certainly feel (and others feel the same) that that original scheme would have been the final scheme had it not been for the public agitation that took place at that time?—I will undertake to prove at the next meeting of this Committee that before that scheme I think, but certainly in September 1893, a Committee, over which the Lord Mayor who raised the fund presided, laid down that the principle of the distribution of the "Victoria" Relief Fund should be graded according to rank and wages, and it was upon that principle that the ultimate distribution of the fund (as appears in the report of last year) was made.

1130. But you objected all the way through to allow anybody to be in receipt of a pension larger than the full pay that the husband was receiving at the time of his death?—I do not know that that was ever objected to.

1131. It is clearly stated in Lord Nelson's letter?—Certainly not in any official intimation from the Commissioners, in the shape of the reports to Her Majesty, and certainly in no official communication from me as the servant of the Commissioners.

1132. Do you remember that a reply was written to a certain article that appeared in the "Fortnightly Review," of which I was handed a copy by the Secretary of State for War. May I ask if you accept that article as official; I understood it to represent the reply of the Patriotic Commissioners; I may be quite wrong?—You are quite wrong.

1133. It was sent for publication to certain papers?—Certainly not; and, as far as I know, I really could not, without a stretch of imagination, answer that I know of any article at all.

1134. You know the article in question to which I refer?—You have told me in private conversation of an article, and I have told you that it had no genesis of any kind whatever in the Patriotic Fund.

1135. Then I have been clearly misinformed upon the point?—Yes.

1136. Lord Spencer foresaw, in handing over this fund, that there might possibly be a surplus, and there was a correspondence between him and the Patriotic Commissioners in which he wished to make it a condition that in the case of there being a surplus it should pass to the Admiralty?—That is so.

1137. But

Mr. Kearley—continued.

1137. But he did not get his way in that matter ultimately?—He could not.

1138. Why could he not?—Because the Commissioners had no choice. Parliament has laid upon the Commissioners a certain responsibility in regard to policy, and it is not in the power, naturally, of the Commissioners to depart from anything which the Legislature has laid down; and the Legislature laid down that the surpluses of funds were to be applied in the manner indicated by the Act of 1881. It would have been simply ultra vires of their liability to Parliament to have undertaken a fund that did not come under that provision.

1139. The "Victoria" went down in June, I think?—June 1893.

1140. But you did not begin to administer the fund until November, five months afterwards, and then on the basis of those small allowances; can you account for the delay in administering these funds?—I do not admit that the word "delay" applies in the very slightest degree to the facts of the case. There was relief being issued at Portsmouth to an extent quite adequate to all the immediate necessities.

1141. I was coming to that; but am I correct in saying that the Patriotic Commissioners did not begin to administer their funds until the 1st November?—I do not admit that as an accurate description. Administration commenced with the receipt of the funds for disposal. That did not take place until August. Then, again, by that time, we had created a local committee at Portsmouth, over which the mayor presided, who intimated to us that they were in possession of ample funds for the relief of the sufferers by the loss of the "Victoria." It was quite in concert with them that we acted, and it would have been absolutely wrong for the Commissioners to have overlapped that relief. It is true that no money was distributed from the Lord Mayor's fund until the 1st November 1893, but for no other reason in this world than that which I have stated.

1142. I understand you to say that the Portsmouth committee was administering a fund collected at Portsmouth, and that was the reason you had not administered until November?—That is hardly an adequate description of the facts; it ought to be supplemented by mentioning that that committee was appointed by the Commissioners themselves, and therefore the Commissioners were daily in touch with the necessities of the sufferers, and relief was being afforded.

1143. But you say that committee was administering relief at Portsmouth?—In conjunction with Miss Weston.

1144. The local committee never administered a shilling of their fund in relief at Portsmouth?—I rather brought out that fact in my previous evidence to show that if the Portsmouth committee who had the bulk of the widows living there under their eye, did not spend a penny, it would have been obviously wrong on the part of the Commissioners to have spent anything.

1145. Miss Weston denies that she was acting on behalf of the Patriotic Fund Commissioners in the relief she gave?—Certainly.

Mr. Kearley—continued.

1146. I hope to have Miss Weston here, and I understand she will give evidence to the effect that had it not been for her administration of relief these widows and orphans would practically have starved, and that is the reason why I am pressing you upon the point?—Of course Miss Weston may say what she likes. I do not mean for a moment to say she was administering the relief on behalf of the Patriotic Fund Commissioners; but I do say that if the local committee at Portsmouth are to be believed, and they have made their pronouncement in public, it is because of their knowledge of what she was doing that they did not spend a single penny of the fund subscribed to them; they were acting in conjunction with Miss Weston in regard to relief for which Miss Weston intimated to them she had received funds.

1147. How were the dependents scattered about the country and in Ireland and Scotland relieved?—In many cases Miss Weston gave relief to them. As a matter of fact I know she did, because, at my request, with a view to our not overlapping, she was good enough to send me a statement of the relief which she was giving.

1148. You decided that relief in certain quarters should not be given until two years after the ship had gone down; let me refer you to the case of Mrs. Mary Tiltman; she was a dependent relative; you wrote to her on the 13th of January 1894: "Mrs. Mary Tiltman,—I have the pleasure, by direction of the Commissioners of the Patriotic Fund, to acquaint you that you have been granted in respect of your late son, Edward Tiltman, who was unfortunately lost in H.M.S. 'Victoria,' an allowance from the above fund, as follows: Five shillings (5*s.*) a week for life during widowhood. As you have received from the Admiralty in respect of your late son a gratuity of 48*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*, the above allowance will commence on 1st July 1895, and will be paid to you quarterly, in advance, from that date"?—I await your question. I do not know what I have to answer.

1149. Do you consider that you were justified in delaying this woman's relief from this fund for two years, simply because she had received 48*l.* from the Admiralty?—It was the opinion undoubtedly of our committee, that that lump sum of money should last for a given time, because it exceeded, undoubtedly, the amount for which she had been dependent upon her son.

1150. You deliberately took the line of holding back this woman's allowance for two years, because she had this money in hand from the Admiralty?—Undoubtedly, the committee thought it was wrong for the relief through the Patriotic Fund, or rather the Victoria Relief Fund, to overlap the relief that had been afforded through the Admiralty.

1151. I will call your attention to a letter Lord Nelson wrote to the "Times" on 19th January of last year. Referring to this question, he said, "The case of a deferred payment till July 1895 was, we believe, a slip of the pen"; he publicly pronounced it to be an accident?

Mr. Kearley—continued.

accident?—I can answer for it that nothing was given except by the decision of the committee; but I will look up the circumstances. The honourable Member has not given me the information beforehand, and it is impossible I can answer the question off-hand.

1152. I am quoting from a letter which I will hand to you, if you wish to see it. This is the letter to Mrs. Mary Tiltman?—I know the case; I will look into the circumstances.

1153. I have seen the original letter, and I think it is in your own writing?—They were all signed by me.

1154. I see the date in the letter is mentioned on three different occasions?—I should hesitate to think it was a mistake, because I conducted the examination of every one of these applications before the committee, and every case was dealt with by the committee, whose instructions I carried out.

1155. Ultimately, I believe this woman received the money earlier than the date you named?—Very possibly.

1156. You reviewed the whole system of delaying these payments, and amended the date?—Yes: and I will tell you why. It was because the practice of paying in lump sums awards from Admiralty Funds induced apparently temporary extravagance on the part of the recipients, and we had evidence (which we could not have had at first, and no doubt it would have been wrong for the committee to assume it) that these sums were dissipated within a very short time of their being received. Consequently, the reason for withholding these permanent grants for such a period as has been referred to, it was felt, did not hold good, and the grants took place at an earlier date.

1157. With regard to Miss Weston: Miss Weston states in this correspondence which appeared in the "Times," that she wrote to you, pointing out the serious result of the delay in administering relief, and the only satisfaction she got was a letter in which you stated you were too busy to see her?—I would like to produce that correspondence. Miss Weston has placed upon that correspondence an inference that I do not think any intelligent or impartial mind would draw from it.

1158. Miss Weston also states that the Portsmouth Committee got into communication with her, at her request; that she called their attention to the fact that the administration was not going on, and how serious the result was. She says she first of all opened the negotiations, the inference being that had she not intervened this delay would have continued; she says that the committee at Portsmouth was inactive, and likely to continue inactive?—That is surely a matter for Miss Weston to settle with the committee at Portsmouth; and what the relation of it is with the Patriotic Fund Commissioners I fail to see.

1159. Lord Nelson points out in this correspondence that the Patriotic Fund Commissioners deemed it the first consideration to invest the money; he gives that as an explanation of the delay; do you think, with so many dependents awaiting succour, that the first consideration ought to have been to invest the money; ought it not to have been to administer the money?—Is the honourable Member quoting Lord Nelson quite correctly.

1160. Quite accurately, I believe; I will give you the quotation in a moment. With regard to the intention of increasing these allowances, it is stated in this correspondence, and it is quoted by Miss Weston in her letter, that in the opinion of the Patriotic Fund Commissioners, it was obviously wrong and unfair to the whole class to give any woman more than her husband would have received had he been alive?—That is a statement by Miss Weston.

1161. As being the opinion of the Patriotic Fund Commissioners?—Clearly Miss Weston is not authorised to state the opinion of the Patriotic Fund Commissioners.

1162. Do you deny that they ever held that opinion; am I to understand that you do not agree that the Patriotic Fund Commissioners ever had an idea of refusing to make these grants larger than the pay that the man was receiving at the time of his death?—I say that the answer to that is that the actual scheme of allowances that was sanctioned by the Commissioners appears in the Appendix to the Thirty-second Report.

1163. The final allowances?—I have already suggested to the honourable Member that the provisional scheme was purely provisional.

1164. There is only one other point I wish to ask you about. We see at the commencement of the Report a list of the Patriotic Fund Commissioners, very distinguished gentlemen. I suppose some of them do not attend your meetings at all. For instance, I see that Lord Rosebery is a Patriotic Fund Commissioner, and Mr. Gladstone also?—You are in error as to Lord Rosebery; he is not a Commissioner.

1165. I thought I had seen his name in the list. Is he not a Commissioner?—He is not a Commissioner; I can tell you that off-hand.

1166. It is a very long list; I will not trouble to read it. I see Mr. Gladstone is a Patriotic Fund Commissioner?—As you have mentioned Mr. Gladstone, I would like to tell the Committee a circumstance connected with his name appearing on that list. Mr. Gladstone wrote to me this year, stating that he did not feel that he could allow his name to remain any longer on the list of Commissioners, and requested me to withdraw it. I wrote to him to say that of course if he persisted in that view I should take the necessary steps, but that I ventured to place before him certain circumstances which came under my knowledge in connection with the desire of a former Commissioner to take the same step, and that was the discussion which took place in my presence between two Commissioners (they are both dead now, as it happens) as to the propriety of such a step. One of the Commissioners, who had been a Cabinet Minister, stated that he believed that when anyone accepted service on a Royal Commission, Her Majesty's command to serve on that Commission became a permanent command for life, and that therefore it was not proper for anyone to resign such public service. In the end

Mr.

Mr. Kearley—continued.

Mr. Gladstone consented to his name remaining on the list.

1167. Do you keep a book of attendances so that we could appreciate who directs the policy of the Patriotic Fund Commissioners?—Every meeting of the Commissioners and of the Executive and Finance Committee is recorded in the Minute Books of the proceedings of those bodies with the names of those who attend upon each occasion.

1168. What I should like to have would be a return of the attendances for the last few years. You have the materials for supplying that, I understand?—Yes.

Chairman.

1169. If the Committee think it desirable to have such a return you would be able to furnish it?—Yes, no doubt.

Mr. Kearley.

1170. There is one other question which we may be able to decide now. Reference was made to a return giving a digest of the ages of those on the funds. You told me the other day that you did not understand that you were to make such a return, or that the Committee had ordered it?—I expressed certain views as to the cost of such a return in relation to the cost of management, and I awaited the appreciation of the Commission of those remarks, but I have since had the advantage of talking over the matter with one of the Commissioners, and I see that, without pressing that point further, what we can do is to make now the re-valuation which would be made at the end of this year serve the same purpose, and, consequently, no extra cost beyond that which would fall at the end of the year would be caused.

1171. That is not what I am putting to you. I am referring to a return, and I understood that the Committee had instructed the Patriotic Fund Commissioners to make such a return, of all the beneficiaries on the various funds, with their ages, so that if it were desired we might make an independent valuation?—That was in your earlier remarks, I think; but in your last remarks you distinctly put it, as I understood, that that re-valuation should be made by Mr. Finlaison, not by an independent actuary. I understood that you would be quite satisfied with that.

1172. I should not, of course, question Mr. Finlaison's valuation; but I desire, if the Committee will support me in my desire, to have a tabulated list of the beneficiaries on the various funds, with their ages?—The only object of furnishing that is for the purpose of an independent valuation. Of course, it is for the Committee to decide whether they desire to have such a return.

1173. I do not think it need be stated at all what the object of it is. The question is whether the Committee decide that such a return should be made?—Quite so. Of course, I am the servant of the Committee. I quite understand what the honourable Member wishes. It is the usual statistical information which we furnish Mr. Finlaison with, and if it is the pleasure of the Committee I will, of course, put it in.

Mr. Kearley—continued.

Chairman.

1174. Such a return can be furnished if the Committee desire it?—Yes, I have it here, so far as that goes; I anticipated the demand.

Mr. Kearley.

1175. As regards the return asked for by the honourable Gentleman the Member for Guildford, has that return been furnished to the Committee, or is it being prepared?—I have presented a return, so far as I have been able to prepare it, in the hope that as rendered it will be found to be sufficient for the purposes of honourable Members.

1176. Then could you let us have the Royal Warrant of 1893, which governs the administration of the Soldiers' Effects Fund?—I have it here.

1177. Will you put it in?—Yes. (The same was handed in.)

Mr. Thomas Bayley.

1178. You say you are anxious to widen the scope and the usefulness of these funds; do you mean by having more Parliamentary powers?—That is the only way in which it can be done now, inasmuch as Parliament has laid down the policy for the adoption of the Commissioners.

1179. In the Act of the 12th of August, 1867, to make better provision for the administration of the Patriotic Fund, at the end of Clause 5 it says: "Thirdly, in maintenance, education, training, and advancement of children of other soldiers, seamen, and marines of Her Majesty's Army and Navy who have lost, or hereafter lose, their lives in the service of the Crown, or by or in consequence of casualties sustained or disease contracted in the service of the Crown." Do you say you would have it much wider than that?—Much wider as regards widows; that applies only to children.

1180. You would simply put "widows and children"; that is your idea of making it much wider, is it?—Parliament has, as a matter of fact, laid down the actual procedure in Section 4 of the Patriotic Fund Act of 1881, which is that Her Majesty's advisers may advise Her Majesty to issue a Supplementary Commission to give effect to the provisions of that clause, which is, briefly, to enable the application of any of the surpluses of the funds for general purposes for the benefit of widows, orphans, and other dependents of soldiers, sailors, and marines.

1181. But with regard to children you cannot have the provision wider than it is?—Certainly not.

1182. Then what you mean by making it wider is that you would put in front of the word "children" "widows and children"?—Yes, except this: that you will recollect that that Act was specifically relating to the Patriotic Fund alone, and consequently the Act of 1881 takes a much wider purview.

1183. But this gives you almost unlimited power; the words are, "Casualties sustained or disease contracted in the service of the Crown;"

Mr. Thomas Bayley—continued.

it is very wide indeed for children, is it not?—Yes, absolutely wide; in fact, we place the most liberal interpretation upon that, in admitting to the benefits of the Royal Victoria Patriotic Asylum.

1184. Your idea then would be to put the word "widows" before "children"?—And other dependents.

1185. Then at the end of the Act, in Clause 21, it says: "Any Supplementary Commission may direct that the fund known as the Rodriguez Fund shall be applied for the same or the like purposes as the Patriotic Fund, and the same shall be applied accordingly." Have the Commissioners made any use of that clause; have they considered the question of taking that fund over; the section gives them the power of taking over bodily the Rodriguez Fund, and putting it to the same purposes as the Royal Patriotic Fund?—That is so, and it is under that clause that the extension has taken place of late years, in granting educational allowances to children, which forms the bulk of the application of the Rodriguez Fund at the present moment.

1186. Then the Commission have gone carefully into that clause, and have passed certain resolutions on the Rodriguez Fund?—Specifically in relation to the Rodriguez Fund.

1187. As a matter of fact, you might have taken the Rodriguez Fund over bodily according to that clause?—We might have actually put it into the corpus of the Patriotic Fund itself, and it might have been lost sight of; but the principle of the Commissioners has been to reserve any benefactions that are specially given in this way by keeping them in separate accounts.

Mr. Mowbray.

1188. I just wish to ask one question arising out of a question Mr. Kearley asked about the "Victoria" Fund. I did not quite understand one statement of yours; I think you said some widow did not get relief for two years, because she had had 48*l.* from the Admiralty in the first instance in a lump sum?—My answer was meant to convey that the decision which was communicated in the letter which the honourable Member read, to the effect that the benefaction to be afforded from the "Victoria" Fund would not commence until two years after the date of the loss of the "Victoria," was caused by the consideration given by the committee who examined into the claim, to the fact that a sum of 48*l.* odd had been granted by the Admiralty as compensation for the loss of the son.

1189. That was what I quite understood was it; but then I wanted to ask whether that was consistent with the statement on page 16 of your paper, that the allowances on the "Victoria" Fund are "in addition to naval pensions and allowances from Greenwich Hospital Funds," because in this case you seem to have postponed the payment out of the "Victoria" Fund on the ground that something had been received from the Admiralty funds?—There is a technical difference which I think any one accustomed to Naval administration will understand, and it is this: The statement on page 16, that these allowances are in addition to naval pensions and allowances from Greenwich Hospital Funds, applies in the case of permanent allowances from Naval Funds. In the case of Mrs. Tiltman she was what is called a dependent relative. She was not entitled to a permanent allowance from the Greenwich Hospital Fund, but was awarded a gratuity that represented 12 months' pay of the son who was lost, and therefore the statement on page 16 is perfectly consistent with the statement that in this case the gratuity has been taken into consideration.

1190. Then, it comes practically to this, does it not: that if the allowance had been in the shape of an annual payment it would not have been a bar to her receiving assistance from the public funds, but having been in the shape of a lump sum you did take it into consideration?—To the extent of the lump sum.

1191. There is one other question I wish to ask with regard to the "Victoria" Fund; for how long were these subscriptions coming in after the fund began to be raised?—The fund was raised by the Lord Mayor, not by the Commissioners. The process was for His Royal Highness, the president of the Patriotic Fund Commission, to appeal to the Lord Mayor to open a fund, and beyond that nothing was done, so far as the Patriotic Fund Commissioners were concerned, to gather in subscriptions. That work was done by the Lord Mayor, and the correspondence which is attached to the 32nd Report explains how that fund was handed over ultimately to the Patriotic Fund Commissioners in instalments, the first of which reached us on the 9th of August 1893.

1192. What I wanted to know was whether subscriptions came in to a larger amount after the provisional arrangements that have been referred to were first arrived at?—No, I should say that the subscriptions in the earlier days were of a larger amount; it was practically subscribed, I should think, by September.

1193. Then, in fact, at the time at which you came to your provisional arrangement you had practically got the whole amount which you subsequently had to deal with?—No, not altogether.

1194. Practically?—The first instalment of 50,000*l.* was handed over to us on the 9th of August. I should have to refer to the accounts to answer intelligently the question as to whether it really did come to us before the provisional scheme, but I think, practically, it may be admitted.

1195 I want to know whether the provisional character of the scheme was affected by the fact that large and substantial sums came into your hands after the provisional scheme, and that that led to a modification of the scheme?—I understand your question now, and my answer is that, on the contrary, the provisional scheme was put forth simply and entirely as a provisional relief in addition to the relief which had been already afforded, and in view of that relief in many cases being in sums which would have been larger than what would ordinarily have been the case; that is to say, than what would ordinarily have been the case according to such information as we had with regard to previous funds.

1196. There was no intention of its being a permanent arrangement?—On the contrary, I would would like to refer again to my answer to a previous Question (1129), because I think it will much better than any other answer show that the principle which ultimately obtained as to the distribution of the relief was based upon "rank and salary"; I will produce the agenda-book, and the minute therein of the Lord Mayor himself, showing those words "rank and salary" attached, and therefore, what principle the fund was to be administered upon. I hope that will be completely satisfactory to the Committee, as showing the principles on which from the very first it was to be administered.

Mr. Seale-Hayne.

1197. There are just one or two points I should like to get some information upon. How often do the Patriotic Fund Commissioners meet?—The Patriotic Fund Commissioners meet when there is no particular administrative business for consideration once a year; but when there is business like the administration of a new fund (the "Victoria" Fund, for instance) they meet as often as the requirements of the case indicate.

1198. I presume during the last two years, or three years, they have only met once a year?—No, a great deal more.

1199. But I want to know, on the average, how often do they meet?—I cannot say as to the average; under the circumstances I have just indicated, that is in ordinary circumstances, when there was no business requiring administrative direction, for it is to be remembered that the Commissioners' province is entirely in giving direction to another body, which is the executive and finance committee——

1200. I am coming to that presently. They have, as a body of Commissioners, no regular days of attendance, except this single annual meeting?—That is so.

1201. Now, who are the executive committee?—The names of the executive committee are given on the third page of every report that is presented to Her Majesty.

1202. Who usually attend?—Nearly all of them.

1203. Do all of them attend?—All of them attend.

1204. How frequently are these meetings?—Once a month invariably, and sometimes oftener; during the time of the "Victoria" Fund there were meetings almost continually.

1205. But I mean when they have nothing special like that?—Once a month.

1206. Is once a month the regular meeting day?—Yes, for the executive and finance committee; there are other sub-committees.

1207. You say all of them attend?—Sometimes I have had as many as 14 out of the 16.

1208. I want to get at what the average is?—You may say they always attend. It would be very invidious to take out any one and say he did not attend.

1209. We are not here to pay attention to considerations of that sort: we want to know, as a matter of fact, are you correct in stating that these gentlemen always attend?—Certainly.

1210. All of them?—Certainly.

1211. Are you going to put in a table of the attendances?—As the Committee please.

Mr. Seale-Hayne—continued.

1212. That I understand the Committee will decide presently. Meanwhile, I will ask you this: If I pick out one or two of these gentlemen, are you prepared to give evidence now as to the number of their attendances?—Speaking from memory, I could certainly.

1213. I want the actual fact?—My memory is good enough to say whether any individual is regular or irregular in attendance.

1214. You will understand I do not wish to reflect upon any of these gentlemen in the least degree; I only want to arrive at the actual facts of the case?—Quite so.

1215. I will take a friend of my own, whose name I see here, Mr. Leveson-Gower, how many times has he attended during the past year?—During this year he has already been three times out of five, I should think; he was at the last meeting.

1216. Are you prepared to state that he has attended three times this last year?—I would rather put in a return if the Committee wish to have the exact attendances.

1217. I think it would be much better if we had the return. What are the provinces of the executive committee and the sub-committees that you have mentioned?—The province of the executive committee is to carry out the orders and regulations of the Commissioners in regard to the administration of the various funds.

1218. That is rather a general answer?—Their province is very general.

1219. You say there are sub-committees, and, of course, those sub-committees have each their various provinces; would you just inform us what they do?—There is the committee of management of the Royal Patriotic Asylum, which you will see referred to on the third page, which consists of 12 members of the committee and four ladies who assist the committee. They deal with the management of the Royal Victoria Patriotic Asylum and its endowments.

1220. Will you give us the name of another sub-committee?—There is the finance sub-committee, which is a sub-committee of four members of the executive and finance committee, which reports directly to the executive and finance committee upon detail matters connected with the accounts and finance.

1221. Who belong to that sub-finance committee?—The Right Honourable Sir Arthur Hayter, Lord Chelmsford, Sir Arthur Herbert, and Mr. Henry Robinson.

1222. All questions of investment, re-investment, and transfer of money, I presume, are dealt with by that finance sub-committee?—Not necessarily: when it is a matter of such magnitude as that which was indicated in the question addressed to the auditor in connection with the sale of 71,000*l.* of colonial securities last year, that was entrusted, by the desire of the Commissioners, to the Right Honourable William Lidderdale, who is on the Board of the Bank of England, and an ex-governor of the Bank of England.

1223. As regards other smaller transfers of stock (of which I have a list here, which I shall put a question about presently) are these transfers brought before the finance sub-committee?—They are approved by the finance sub-committee and reported to the executive and finance committee committee on each occasion that they are made.

1224. I understood you to say just now that these transfers of stock were not brought before the finance committee?—You did not ask me any questions about the transfer of stock until this last question, as I understood.

1225. I asked whether transfers of stock and matters of investments came before the finance committee?—And I said, when they assumed the magnitude which I referred to, they were dealt with specially by the Right Honourable William Lidderdale.

1226. I asked you whether these small transactions come before the finance committee?—I answer that they come before the finance sub-committee.

1227. Each one?—Each one. They cannot be carried out without the authority of the executive and finance committee. The finance sub-committee has no authority to deal with these by itself; it only reports.

1228. I only ask for the sake of information. In the administration of these funds, and in awarding the weekly amounts payable and so on, do you take into consideration the private circumstances of the recipient?—All the awards of specials funds are made under the conditions of the trust-deed.

1229. I know that; but let me take, for instance, the Balaclava Relief Fund, in which you added certain allowances of 7*s.* a week, as referred to on page 14 of your paper; do you inquire before making such an addition into the circumstances of the recipient?—We are bound by the provisions of the deed to do so.

1230. What sort of an inquiry do you make?—We make an inquiry as to whether the recipients are in circumstances of privation and want, and whether they are in receipt of an army pension.

1231. All those things are taken into consideration, are they?—They are bound to be by the provisions of the deed.

1232. I am not asking whether they are bound to be, but whether they are as a fact?—I cannot answer the question, except according to what one feels is the necessity of the case.

1233. Are they taken into consideration or are they not; I understand you to say that they are?—Yes; but the importance of it is that these things are dictated to the Commissioners by the deed.

1234. I do not question that in the least; but they are taken into consideration, are they?—Subject to what I have said, that is so.

1235. Now, in the 33rd Report of the Commissioners, I see as regards the school, the Diocesan Inspector's Annual Report, you have other children besides Church of England children in that school, have you not?—Not at the Royal Victoria Patriotic Asylum.

1236. Are there no Wesleyans?—No; we tried to get them, but we could not get any.

1237. Did you not tell us that there were some Wesleyans in that school?—On the contrary, my answer was to the effect that we tried and could not get them.

1238. I understood you to say that there were some Wesleyans. The Roman Catholics I know are at a school elsewhere, but I understood you to say that there were some Wesleyans?—We tried to get them in, and I said I was in communication with a reverend gentleman who represented the interests of the soldiers' and sailors' children with a view to getting in children of the Wesleyan faith, but up to the present moment we have not succeeded in getting in any. If you will turn to my answer you will find that that is what I said.

1239. I daresay you are right, but it is a remarkable thing, is it not, that there are no Wesleyan applicants?—It is, and I remarked it to the gentleman himself when he called on me some ten days ago; I said, "You have not brought us a single case yet."

Colonel Wyndham Murray.

1240. Did he give any reason for it?—I think those who are conversant with the return of religions in the Army know that, so far as declaration is concerned, at all events, the proportion is very much greater of those who declare they belong to the Church of England.

Mr. Seale-Hayne.

1241. I hold in my hand a list that has been furnished me by my office of the transfers that have taken place since December 1888 to the present time; those transfers, as you are aware, come to me and have to be signed by me, and I merely ask this for the sake of information. I observe in a recent transaction in January 1895 there was a transfer of Great Western Railway Stock of 1,793*l.* 2*s.* 1*d.* from general account to the "Captain" Relief Fund. Then in March 1895 there was a transfer of 1,223*l.* 14*s.* 5*d.* of 2¾ per cent. consols from the "Soldiers' Effects" Fund to the "Captain" Relief Fund; will you explain to me, and let the Committee know as a matter of information, why it was necessary to do that; for what purpose were the transfers made?—The accounts for this year will show that those transactions were due, in the case of the "Captain" Relief Fund that has been quoted, to the fact that a certain number of colonial bonds were paid off, and the Patriotic Fund requiring money to meet its immediate necessities, the transfer was made from the Patriotic Fund of the Great Western stock, and the cash was taken from the "Captain" Fund. Similarly, the other transactions referred to in the case of the "Eurydice" Fund were the result of the auditor calling attention, as it now turns out erroneously, to the fact that certain investments that were made at the end of last year——

1242. That is another transaction to which I have not called attention; the one I spoke about was the transfer from the Soldiers' Effects Fund again to the "Captain" Relief Fund?—That is the explanation; it was in connection with those queries.

1243. How does that accord with the general policy of keeping all these funds separate, because the transfers backwards and forwards from fund to fund are very numerous indeed?—They are necessarily numerous. Every year there are deficiencies to be met on the part of certain funds, funds, and there are surpluses to be invested on the part of other funds, and those transfers are the results of a scheme which is most profitable to the fund concerned; because instead of selling out in one case to meet deficiencies, as was the case some years ago, and buying in in other cases, a mere book transfer taken upon the evidence of the Bank of England of the price of the day suffices for the transaction; and thereby the loss that results from sales and investments in the shape of commission and the turn of the market is saved to the various funds.

1244. I want to know why you treat each of these funds as a separate estate, as it were; as I understand you to say you do?—It is so.

1245. That being so, why is it necessary to transfer backwards and forwards from one fund to the other these sums of money at different times; because it would seem, instead of treating it as a separate estate upon its own bottom, you are treating the whole as one fund?—On the contrary, we are treating them absolutely as separate funds and separate estates. Those transactions, in fact, are maintaining the principle of separate estates.

1246. If you treat them as separate estates, why is it necessary to transfer the money from one fund to the other?—Because some funds have to sell out stock to meet deficiencies of income, to meet payments, while other funds are giving a surplus every day; they have more cash in hand than is required to meet expenditure. Consequently we make these transfers. In the Capital and Income Accounts why it is done is clearly accounted for.

1247. I have not the slightest doubt of that. I am only asking to ascertain what principle it is that you go upon?—Upon the highest economy.

1248. Who is it that determines what investments are made and the character of the investments; who is responsible for that?—The investments, of course, are made at the inception of a fund, as, for example, in the case of the "Victoria" Fund.

1249. I know that; what I am asking is, who orders the investments to be made; is it the Finance Committee, or do they employ a broker, or who determines what investments are to be made?—I replied to the honourable Member that, in the case of the large re-investments that took place, the Right Honourable William Lidderdale undertook the duties of making the investments; and that applies in the case of all new investments.

1250. But the Right Honourable William Lidderdale is not always present; what is the rule of the Commission?—He is always present for that purpose; the thing is referred to him to do.

1251. He is a single individual; what is the rule of the Patriotic Fund Commissioners in regard to investments; who determines it?—The Right Honourable William Lidderdale in this case.

1252. He is a man who has only been there for a few years?—The Right Honourable Lord Addington did it before.

1253. It is entrusted to one individual, is it?—Undoubtedly, because the desire is to get the highest financial experience in the matter.

Chairman.

1254. Then his action is approved by the Committee afterwards?—Yes.

Mr. Seale-Hayne.

1255. That being so, let me ask who advised the investment in Manchester Ship Canal Debentures?—The Right Honourable William Lidderdale; but I ought, I think, to have noticed the question put by the honourable Member for Devonport in that respect, and to have brought it out in evidence that the debentures are those called the "First Series," one repayable in 1896 and the other in 1914, and specially secured upon the tolls of the Bridgewater Canal, which, even supposing that the Manchester Ship Canal were to come to an end, would be sufficient to pay the interest upon those debentures.

1256. That security was the Right Honourable William Lidderdale's recommendation?—That was so.

1257. Who recommended the investment of so much money in Colonial Bonds?—Well, that, of course, is an accumulation of a number of years; and as Lord Addington was the adviser up to 1892, I think it may be said it was due to some extent to Lord Addington.

1258. You only speak as to that from recollection?—From the fact that in turning up the correspondence I have seen that Lord Addington was the adviser of the Commissioners in these matters.

1259. Does any resolution exist in your books appointing Lord Addington the adviser of the Commissioners in these matters?—I could not say without referring to the books; it is before my time.

1260. Is there any resolution in your books appointing the Right Honourable William Lidderdale adviser to the Commissioners in these matters?—I think so.

1261. Can you say so positively?—I can refer you to the last minutes in which the Right Honourable William Lidderdale, at any rate, reported to the Royal Patriotic Commissioners in person the result of his re-investments.

1262. As I understood you just now, in estimating the value of your property you take into consideration its income-bearing capacity more than the market value. I wish to understand what you said just now, because I rather think it has led to misapprehension. In stating the values of these securities which you hold, you value them rather in regard to their income-bearing capacity in order to meet your annual expenditure than having regard to the capital value if they were put upon the market; is that so?—The valuation of all the securities lies entirely with the Actuary, Mr. Finlaison, and with no one else. I do not value the securities, the committee do not value the securities, and the Commissioners do not value the securities.

1263. I want to refer you to an answer you made just now to a question put by the honourable Member for Devonport. Your answer led me to suppose that the income which the security produced was, in your mind, the measure of the value of that security?—I am afraid my answer must have been misinterpreted. I think the question to which the right honourable gentleman refers is that in which I explained the circumstance of the decrease of capital in the "Eurydice" Fund; that is to say, the Colonial Securities were producing 4 per cent., and yet, to put them into Home Securities of the class we have to put them into, we have to pay almost the same money, and only get 3 per cent. from the face value.

1264. Still, the better-class security will make the total value of the fund all the better?—The right honourable gentleman is directing his observations to a point which is entirely within the responsibility of the actuary.

1265. We have had the evidence of the actuary?—I have no responsibility, nor have the Committee, nor have the Commissioners, with regard to the valuation of the securities.

Mr. Seale-Hayne—continued.

1266. What we want to get at here, and what it appears we have not got at present, is the total value in the market of the whole of the securities you hold. The actuary told us that he took into consideration the income capacity of each security, and the result is that the most valuable securities appear at a lower rate than the inferior securities in his valuation. Now what we want to get at, and what, I take it, the honourable Member for Devonport wants to get at, is the actual market value of all the securities you have got here. That is not shown on your accounts?—Certainly not.

Mr. THOMAS CAVE-BROWNE-CAVE, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

1267. WILL you explain the position you occupy at the War Office?—I am an Assistant Accountant General of the Army.

1268. Has it come within the range of your duty to consider applications from widows, orphans, and dependent persons, from time to time, made to the Secretary of State for War?—Yes.

1269. Are such applications numerous?—Yes, very numerous.

1270. Is there any fund administered at the War Office which is available for that class of persons below the rank of an officer?—None whatever.

1271. What is the course taken when such applications come; are there a number which you are not able to assist from any War Office funds; what is done in such cases?—The regret of the Secretary of State is expressed that he has no fund at his disposal out of which he can meet the claims.

1272. Is it your practice to communicate with the Patriotic Fund Commissioners at any time?—Only in very exceptional cases, where we think the Patriotic Fund Commissioners might possibly be able to grant relief; such cases are very rare.

1273. You have, I believe, taken the trouble to extract from the records in your department some examples of the kind I refer to, have you not?—Yes. You asked us for a return of all the refusals since the 1st January 1887, and we have searched 34 books containing 40,000 pages for applications from relatives of soldiers, and 17 books containing 14,000 pages for applications from relatives of officers. We have analysed them since, to a great extent, and have taken out from that number 43 specimen cases, and sent them to the Patriotic Fund Commissioners, to ascertain whether they could have granted relief had those applications been sent to them. I have the answer from the Patriotic Fund Commissioners here to the effect "that a reply shall be made as soon as the necessary examination of the applications has been effected as to whether the Commissioners of the Patriotic Fund have any funds at their disposal out of which they can grant assistance in these cases."

Chairman—continued.

You will understand we sent those 43 cases simply as being 43 of the most urgent cases we could find out of the 900 applications.

1274. Are you quoting a stereotype form of reply?—No, this is the form of reply we received from the Patriotic Fund Commissioners to our application when we sent the 43 cases to them for consideration.

1275. What is the date of the reply?—The 28th of this month. We did not send them all, as a matter of fact, at the time they arose; that has not been our practice, because we did not till quite recently (in fact until this Committee was appointed) know of the existence of the "Rodriguez" Fund.

Mr. Brodrick.

1276. What is the total number of cases which you say you have had at the War Office?—We have had from soldiers about 900 cases for relief since the 1st of January 1887.

1277. How many of those were sent on to the Patriotic Fund Commissioners automatically?—I do not suppose above two or three out of the whole number.

1278. That is to say, the War Office recognises no liability, if it cannot dispose of the case itself, to communicate with the Patriotic Fund Commissioners?—None whatever.

1279. There is no system as regards that?—No system whatever. Until we knew of the "Rodriguez" Fund we should not have felt justified in sending them on at all.

1280. At the War Office you have no knowledge officially of what the conditions of the Patriotic Fund grants are; have you any official knowledge as to that?—Not connected with the "Rodriguez" Fund.

1281. The two things are not worked together?—Not at all.

1282. You have, I think, the control of all these questions of retired pay?—Yes; under the Accountant General.

1283. And as regards such questions as relief, you have never been instructed to see Colonel Young in regard to any cases?—No, never.

1284. Consequently,

Mr. Brodrick—continued.

1284. Consequently, it is merely a fortuitous occurrence if a case is sent on by order of the Financial Secretary or the Accountant General?—So far as I can remember, a few cases were sent to the Patriotic Fund Commissioners, because the Accountant General happened himself to be a Patriotic Fund Commissioner, and he thought it worth while to try whether they could get relief from them; but it was from his personal knowledge as a Patriotic Fund Commissioner that he sent them on.

1285. What is the amount of the relief fund every year?—£.1,250; that is, for officers' relatives.

1286. What are the amounts that are usually given in grants to individuals?—It depends entirely upon the merits of each case. If it is the case of a widow who is very badly off, with a large family, as a first grant, as high a sum as 50*l.* has been granted.

1287. That is unusual, I suppose?—That is unusual; there have been several such cases; but the usual grant is 20*l.* to a widow, 15*l.* to a daughter, and 10*l.* to a more distant relative, such as a sister.

1288. Those cannot be renewed until after three years?—Not till after three years.

1289. Consequently they were merely a drop in the ocean?—It is very very slight.

1290. Does it occur to you, with your long experience, that it would be possible to initiate any system by which the War Office might inform the Patriotic Fund Commissioners of all cases which come within the purview, or seem to come within the purview, of the Patriotic Fund, which come first to the War Office?—Yes, I think it would be. Judging from the experience we have had within the last few weeks, I should think it is a very desirable course to adopt, and will undoubtedly be adopted.

1291. Have the Patriotic Fund Commissioners ever informed the War Office officially; or has the knowledge ever come to you officially, that the Patriotic Fund Commissioners were willing to give so much in certain classes of cases; has any advertisement, so to speak, of that kind ever been made?—No.

1292. Except what you have happened to pick up casually, you have no official knowledge?—No official knowledge whatever.

1293. How was the "Soldiers' Effects" Fund administered before 1863?—It was not administered as a fund at all.

1294. How was it administered from 1863 to 1884, when the Royal Warrant was passed handing it over to the Patriotic Fund Commissioners?—It was not treated as a fund; it was simply the unclaimed effects of deceased soldiers invested as funds accumulated; there were no grants out of the fund to anybody until it was handed over to the Patriotic Fund Commissioners.

1295. How long is it before you consider soldiers' effects unclaimed; that is to say, how long is it before you consider yourselves at liberty to hand them over to the Patriotic Fund Commissioners?—In the seventh year; for instance, the amount of the effects which had been received up to the 31st March 1888 was handed over to the Patriotic Fund Commissioners on the 1st April 1895 in accordance with the Act of Parliament, that is seven years afterwards.

1296. Do you advertise in any way the soldiers' effects?—Yes; regularly, in accordance with the Act.

1297. You do what you can?—Yes; a notification is always published in the "London Gazette." So far as we know, we take every step to ensure the effects getting into the hands of those entitled to them.

1298. But, practically, in handing over the "Soldiers' Effects" Funds, you consider you have freed yourself from the whole of that business, and it has now gone to the Patriotic Fund Commissioners?—Quite so.

1299. Will you tell us how the effects of deserters have been treated?—They are not included in the "Soldiers' Effects" Fund; they are carried to the credit of the Full Pay Vote, Appropriation-in-Aid.

Mr. Mowbray.

1300. As an Appropriation in Aid?—Yes, as an Appropriation in Aid of the Full Pay Vote, because a deserter may turn up at any time and have his money.

Mr. Brodrick.

1301. May we take the sum of your evidence to be this: that the War Office having handed over the "Soldiers' Effects" Fund considers it has discharged its functions with regard to the relief of widows of soldiers, but that no machinery exists whereby any widows who might be relieved and are brought to the notice of the War Office are transferred to the Patriotic Fund?—That has been so hitherto.

Chairman.

1302. Do you anticipate there would be any difficulty on our part in devising some method to meet that?—None whatever. Now that it has been brought to notice that some of these cases could be relieved, we shall certainly send up all cases to them that we cannot relieve.

1303. You will undertake that the matter shall not be lost sight of, so that some scheme shall be devised?—Certainly.

Mr. Mowbray.

1304. Were these 900 cases mostly distressed soldiers or widows and children?—They were all distressed relatives of soldiers; most of them were widows and children.

1305. Have you any idea if that proportion of those persons could be entitled to relief under the "Soldiers' Effects" Fund?—A very small proportion, I should say. We have taken out 43 cases as a test, and it is almost impossible to say what the proportion would be until we have had them examined by the Patriotic Fund Commissioners.

Mr. Mowbray—continued.

1306. Do you think that these 43 cases out of the 900 are at the outside the greatest number that could be relieved out of the "Soldiers' Effects" Fund?—Yes; a considerable proportion of the 43 cases have been already relieved by the Patriotic Fund Commissioners. The applicants have gone to the Patriotic Fund Commissioners when they found they could not get relief from us, and have been relieved by the Patriotic Fund Commissioners.

Mr. Mowbray—continued.

1307. I suppose you expect to hear from the Patriotic Fund Commissioners as to these 43 cases in detail?—Yes; we have sent those cases as test cases, and we are awaiting the result.

1308. No doubt the result will be laid before this Committee?—Certainly, if the Committee wish for it.

Friday, 14*th June* 1895.

MR. WILLIAM WOODALL, IN THE CHAIR.

Colonel J. S. YOUNG, re-called; and further Examined.

Mr. Brodrick.

1309. YOU have kindly handed to the Committee the Thirty-third Report, the last Report of the Royal Commissioners. Now, there are at present, I believe, 32 Royal Commissioners, are there not?—Thirty-one, I think.

1310. This Report is signed on the 9th of April by 29 of them; was that Report signed at a meeting of the Commissioners?—By those that were present at a meeting of the Commissioners, but it was circulated to each individual Member for his perusal before he signed it.

1311. How many Commissioners were present at the discussion of the Report?—I am not able to say without referring to the Minute Book, but, speaking from memory, it was 20, I think.

1312. As many as that?—Quite as many as that, I should think; 19 or 20.

1313. Would that be the ordinary attendance?—In accordance with the wish of the Committee at the last meeting, I have prepared returns of the attendances for the last five years of the Commissioners, the Executive Committee, and such Sub-Committees as there are records of attendances.

1314. Could you state generally the effect of those returns?—Well, generally speaking, I think I am within the mark in saying that since I have been secretary (which is, of course, all I could speak of from personal recollection) from 12 to 20 have attended the meetings. Here, for instance, is the return of His Royal Highness's attendances; they are complete; that is, 12 attendances during the last five years; he never missed an attendance. Lord Nelson only missed one, that was 11 out of a possible 12; Lord Chelmsford's attendances are complete; Lord Welby's 10 out of a possible 12; Sir George Hayter-Chubb's 10 out of a possible 11. The attendances of the Accountant General of the Navy are nine out of a possible 12; the Accountant General of the Army complete, 12 attendances; and the others varied from seven down to one out of a possible 12.

1315. That I suppose we may consider as a high ratio of the attendance considering the very busy character of most of your Commissioners?—I should say it was a very good attendance indeed.

Mr. Brodrick—continued.

1316. At all events, what you would convey to the Committee is that there is a considerable interest felt by the individual Commissioners in the whole of the business of the Commission?—Not only is there a considerable interest, but a continuous and active interest on the part of the Commissioners in the administration of the funds.

1317. And it would be erroneous to suppose that the business is mainly transacted by two or three Commissioners; on the contrary, the fact is that a large majority of the Commissioners are present?—It would be absolutely erroneous to draw any such conclusion as that it is done merely by a minority, as the attendances that I have just given show.

1318. Now, taking the general result of your administration of the funds would it be right to consider a fund like the "Captain" Fund, what you may call a temporary fund; it is a fund, is it not, which cannot have any fresh claims on it now?—Exactly so. In answer to the honourable Member for Devonport, I divided the funds into two classes, those which were liable to have fresh annuitants placed upon them in accordance with the conditions, in which category were the Patriotic Fund, the Soldiers' Effects Fund, the Royal Naval Relief Fund, and the Rodriguez Fund; and in the other category were those cases such as the "Captain" Fund, the "Eurydice" Fund, and the "Atalanta" Fund, which were subscribed in the cases of vessels that had gone down, and where consequently no fresh recipients, but those who were dependent upon persons lost in those vessels, could have any claim upon the fund.

1319. Now, I have made a computation here of what are merely terminable funds, that is to say, I suppose I may include in these the "Captain" Fund, the "Eurydice" Fund, the Zulu War Fund, the "Atalanta" Fund, the Ashantee War Fund, the Balaclava Fund, and the "Victoria"

Mr. Brodrick—continued.

"Victoria Fund." Now all those funds, which must sooner or later die out, or the recipients of which must come to an end; they are not like the Patriotic Fund itself?—That is so.

1320. Now do you think it is known to the Commissioners that as a fact the actual expenditure yearly under those terminable funds is less than the interest that is coming in from the securities in respect of those funds?—Undoubtedly in the cases in which that state of affairs does exist; but it does not exist in all cases, as you will see by the table of the statement that I prepared for the Committee.

1321. Taking those funds which I have mentioned (I am leaving out the "Victoria", on which you have been very carefully examined by Mr. Kearley) is it the fact the receipts in 1894 amounted to, roughly speaking, about 3,500*l.*, and that the expenditure in 1894, roughly speaking, amounted to about 2,500*l.*?—I should have to make the calculation, but I would point out that in the "Atalanta" Fund the receipts were 295*l.* and the expenditure was 330*l.*; in the Ashantee War Fund the receipts were 79*l.* 17*s.* 10*d.* and the expenditure 83*l.* 4*s.*; and in the Light Brigade (Balaclava) Fund the receipts were 121*l.* 14s. 6*d.* and the expenditure was 170*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.*

1322. In the "Captain" Fund the receipts, I see, were 1,363*l.*, and the expenditure 1,039*l.*?—Yes.

1323. And in the "Eurydice" Fund the receipts were 582*l.* and the expenditure was 460*l.*?—Yes, that is so, and the Royal Naval Relief Fund and the Zulu War Fund are in that category.

1324. So that it practically comes to this: that in the case of all those terminable funds you are spending less than the actual receipts?—That is well known.

1325. Now, is that a deliberate policy on the part of the Commissioners?—The policy in regard to each fund is, as I have explained, governed first by the conditions of the deed of trust; next by the act of the Legislature, in regard to any surpluses that may arise upon each fund as expressed in Section 4 of the Patriotic Fund Act of 1881. It is admitted that these funds that you have referred to are in receipt of greater income now than the expenditure which is considered necessary in fulfilment of the objects of the trusts, and these go to the increase of the surpluses; and, as I answered to the honourable Member for Devonport, the question of the time at which it may be right to deal with these surpluses in an acute sense must be a matter undoubtedly of the responsibility of the Commissioners as a matter of administration. They have admitted that that time has arrived in regard to the Patriotic Fund, but not in regard to any other fund.

1326. But the question I am rather putting to you is not with regard to the time of dealing with the surpluses, but with regard to the desirability of creating a surplus on these terminable funds; what I want to get at is what is the policy of the Commissioners when a fund of the nature of the "Captain" Fund is placed in their hands to administer; is their policy to give those who are beneficiaries under that fund the utmost amount that can be got out of the fund actuarily, or is it to create a surplus which is to be placed in the lump with the rest of the Patriotic Fund?—It certainly is not to create a surplus; that I can answer most assuredly; surplus arises from quite other circumstances; skill in investment is perhaps the largest cause of surpluses arising; but the policy in regard to those funds is the policy laid down for the Commissioners by the Legislature in connection with the Patriotic Fund; because these funds that you have referred to (the "Captain" and the "Eurydice") were distinctly handed over to follow in the steps of the Patriotic Fund.

1327. But why should not the beneficiaries of each particular fund get the benefit of the skill in investment of the Commissioners?—That, of course, is a matter of policy that has hardly yet attained the stage of development in the direction that the honourable Member is pursuing. The Commissioners consider that the trusts have been met by the allowances that have been already granted.

1328. But does it occur to the Commissioners, do you think, that people who subscribe to these funds after a great disaster subscribe in the hope that those who have lost relatives will get the largest amount that can be got out of their subscriptions?—I answer to that that the deed is in opposition to such an interpretation being placed upon the intentions of the subscribers.

1329. The question we want to get at is this: whether those who subscribe to terminable funds, and for a particular disaster, are to understand from your evidence that out of every pound they give about 15*s.* will go to those people, and 5*s.* will go to a purpose to which they did not subscribe?—Certainly not. I have never given any indication that that is the policy of the Commissioners. I have, on the contrary, given an indication that the Commissioners are bound by the conditions of the trust. In this very "Captain" Fund the deed of trust itself laid down the scales of allowances that were to be given. We did not settle the scales of allowances; they are scheduled in the deed.

1330. That is not so in all the funds?—Those you are referring to, the "Eurydice" and the "Captain" funds, are the two principal ones, and in those it is so; the "Eurydice" also has a schedule of recipients, as you will find here (pointing to the deed of trust).

1331. But the Commissioners have laid down their own scales in several cases?—Not in these trust deed funds.

1332. Not in the "Captain" fund?—No, for in all trust deed funds they take care to place the responsibility upon those who ask them to administer them to indicate the conditions upon which the trusts are to be fulfilled.

1333. Let us take the Rodriguez Fund; the Commissioners were not there bound by anything except the will of Don Rodriguez, were they?—That is so.

1334. The amount of the fund now is 14,771*l.*, and the original bequest was about half that amount, was it not?—Yes.

1335. Now the Commissioners framed the regulations regulations under which they were about to administer the fund, did they not?—Yes, in the 8th Report they laid down the scheme, which I read out on the last occasion, at page 61 of their 8th Report.

1336. The Commissioners say, at page 39 of the 8th Report: "The small amount to be periodically distributed precludes any retrospective action"; why does it preclude that?—Of course, you are asking me a question which relates to the year 1869, and that was their dictum in the year 1869; and, as I have pointed out to the Committee more than once, the administration of the Rodriguez Fund is also governed by the Patriotic Fund Acts of 1867 and 1881, which directed that it should be applied to like purposes as the Patriotic Fund.

1337. Quite so; but before those Acts were passed the Commissioners had the money to deal with, and they laid it down in the year 1869 that no retrospective action was to be taken. They say "indeed there is nothing in the will to indicate that the testator contemplated past wars." Is there anything in the will to show that he contemplated future wars?—Well, of course, it was left, you will admit, to the administration of the Patriotic Fund Commissioners; they were bound to state the conditions which they felt it should be applied to; these are the conditions.

1338. The question we want to get at is whether they have administered it at all for the benefit of those for whom Don Rodriguez intended it. What have they done; they have given a few gratuities, have they not?—A few gratuities. The difficulty, as I pointed out before, in the administration of the Rodriguez Fund, was, in the first instance, that the testator limited it in one paragraph of his will, in which he said, "My executors will take care that no one shall profit by this succour but such as are really indigent and necessitous." The Commissioners were bound to interpret what that meant, and they interpreted it in the way that is laid down in Appendix J. of the 8th Report.

1339. Don Rodriguez was a Spanish subject, was he not?—Yes.

1340. He left money for the families of English subjects dying or wounded in the wars who were necessitous?—Yes.

1341. The wars in which British subjects had been connected with Spain were the wars in the beginning of the century, were they not, when they were fighting for Spanish independence?—That is so.

1342. Does it occur to you that Don Rodriguez, who was alive at the time of those wars, probably intended this money to go to the necessitous relatives of those who had fallen in those wars?—I must again point out to the honourable Member that he is asking me questions personally which I can have no personal knowledge of; I can only refer him again to the interpretation which the Commissioners placed upon it in this scheme: they obviously did not consider that these were the subjects for relief.

1343. Have the Commissioners ever taken any steps, by advertisement or otherwise, in connection with this fund, to make it known that really indigent and necessitous relations of British soldiers dying in the wars could be relieved out of it?—Before 1867, yes; not since, because of the application of the fund to like purposes as the Patriotic Fund.

1344. They did advertise?—Yes.

1345. And did they receive any answers?—No; or very, very few indeed, as is shown in the later reports; they acknowledged that very few would come under the conditions of the will, and of that which they also added as their interpretation.

1346. Did the Commissioners ever communicate to the War Office the fact that they had such legacies to administer. Is there any official communications of the Commissioners to the War Office on those heads?—I could not say without referring, but at the same time it is matter of record in the Parliamentary papers which have already been before the Committee that the Rodriguez Fund was distinctly before the War Office authorities. The War Office authorities, of course, are those who undertake legislation, the carrying through of any Bill relating to the administration of the Patriotic Fund, and in connection with the Act of 1867, they no doubt had the information connected with the Rodriguez Fund, which resulted in the including of a section in that Act directing its application to like purposes as the Patriotic Fund.

1347. How many cases do you have sent to you for relief from the War Office every year?—That would be rather difficult to answer.

1348. What sort of number?—It would be very difficult to answer that off-hand.

1349. I mean, for instance, do you get one letter a week?—Not perhaps so many.

1350. But, having regard to the numerous letters which the War Office receives from indigent persons connected with soldiers, do you not think it would be desirable that there should be some further communication between your Commissioners and the War Office in the matter, some definite system of communication?—I read the evidence of Mr. Cave, given at the last meeting of this Committee, and I quite endorse what was stated there, that it is most desirable that there should be continuous communication between the War Office and the Commissioners in regard to any cases of applications for relief made to the War Office; and, as a result, I believe, of the action before this Committee, such steps will be taken. I was under the impression before that evidence was given that such steps were ordinarily taken, and that I did receive all cases from the War Office that they had sent to them.

1351. Then you say that on this particular fund you have received very few applications?—Very few.

1352. This Rodriguez Fund originated 40 years after the Peninsular War, or a little more, and now 40 years have passed since the Crimean War. You are aware that very numerous claims come in from those whose relatives served in the Crimean War?—So numerous that the Patriotic Fund could not possibly entertain all of them.

1353. Then does it not occur to you that if the terms of Don Rodriguez's will had been known there would have been very heavy claims made on the Commissioners for relief from that fund by those whose relatives had been in the Peninsular War?—Well, of course, that is ignoring again the change that took place in regard to the administration of the Rodriguez Fund, enunciated in the Patriotic Fund Act of 1867, which changed the whole aspect of affairs as regards the Rodriguez Fund; and, as I answered to the honourable Member on your right, we might have lumped that Rodriguez Fund with the Patriotic Fund under that Act.

1354. But surely not. My point is this: We are now a little more than 40 years away from the Crimean War. When Don Rodriguez left this money they were about 40 years away from the Peninsular War; you tell the Committee that there are hardly any applications under the Rodriguez Fund, and that you are inundated with applications under the Crimean Fund; is not the deduction from that that the Commissioners did not properly make known the terms of Don Rodriguez's will to persons interested in connection with the Peninsular War or any other past war?—On the contrary, I consider that the Commissioners would have been absolutely wrong while they were in the position they were after 1880, if they had put on any fresh recipients upon the fund which was authorised by Parliament to be applied to like purposes as the Patriotic Fund when they were not able to fulfil their liabilities to those who were on the Patriotic Fund.

1355. Let me take a case from these papers now in my hands. These are "Cases referred to the Commissioners of the Patriotic Fund on the 27th of May 1895, in which applications for pecuniary assistance have been refused by the War Office during the period from the 1st January 1890 to 31st March 1895, the Secretary of State for War having no funds at his disposal out of which any payment could be made to the Soldiers' Widows or relatives." Here is case No. 37: Mrs. Henrietta J. Pacey, widow of Serjeant Major Pacey, 2nd West India Regiment: Date of application 17th of January 1894. Husband died on service of disease contracted in the Ashantee War." Now were the Commissioners able to do anything in that case?—That has only just been brought to the notice of the Commissioners, as you see the letter is only dated the 27th of May 1895. I acknowledged that letter, and Mr. Cave, in his reply to a question about it at the last Committee meeting, stated that I informed the Secretary of State that these cases would be examined, and the result reported to the War Office. It is obviously impossible to go through such a number as there are in that list without a great deal of examination. The list contains 43 cases; but I have extracted the cases which we have dealt with that came to us as well as to the War Office, and out of the 43, 13 came to us, and were dealt with, and are very likely included in those returns which I put in on the last occasion.

1356. Will you be able to let us have your comment on this list?—At the rate at which I am able to deal with these things in addition to my ordinary work, I do not know how soon it will be. I have been able to deal with two cases, in one of which I have elucidated the fact that the woman has died (Mrs. Lowark); and I have elucidated the fact in another one (Noonan) that the mother was not dependent in any degree upon her son, who, it is stated, was killed in Afghanistan.

1357. With reference to the "Victoria" Fund, you told the Committee that the first scheme was a provisional scheme?—I did.

1358. Now, was not a Return made to the Order of the House of Commons, presented in March 1894; and could you explain to us why the Patriotic Fund Commissioners presented the provisional scheme nine months after the ship sank?—Because the actuarial valuation of the liabilities to be placed upon the fund had not been determined at that time.

1359. Is that not rather a long interval?—Not at all. As I explained to the Committee in my previous evidence, the fund was handed over to us in August, and the number of claims that had to be dealt with extended up to the end of December, and some were not treated till 1894; it was impossible to get any complete valuation of the liabilities to be placed upon it till we had exhausted the list of those who were lost in the vessel in regard to any persons dependent upon them; their number was very large.

1360. Then, with regard to the education of orphans, there is one question that you answered at No. 112; the question put by the Chairman was, "As a matter of fact, are there Roman Catholic orphan applicants who are entitled to assistance whom you have to neglect"; and you reply, "Not to neglect, but we cannot take them in immediately. We have always a large waiting list." Would there be any objection, as you always have orphans waiting, to give money grants under the Act of 1867, so that they might be educated outside the Asylum?—The Act of 1867 applies to the allocation of the Patriotic Fund, and part of the allocation of the Patriotic Fund was the setting aside of the amount that stands under the heading of the Roman Catholic Orphans Fund. Therefore, that is the limitation of the assistance that can be granted to Roman Catholic orphans.

1361. But are you incapacitated by that, then, from giving money grants to orphans?—Because we have no other money.

Mr. Kearley.

1362. Look at the third provision of Section 5 of the Act of 1867: "Thirdly, In maintenance, education, training, and advancement of children of other soldiers, seamen and marines of our Army and Navy, who had lost, or should hereafter lose their lives in the service of the Crown, or by or in consequence of casualties sustained, or disease contracted in the service of the Crown." Have you not power to make money grants in furtherance of that third provision?—It might be so interpreted that we have power to make money grants, but the Commissioners in their policy of administration have put it in the shape of endowment of the Royal Victoria Patriotic Asylum on the one hand, and the Roman Catholic Orphans' Fund on the other hand.

1363. Then

Mr. Kearley—continued.

1363. Then this clause is dead practically excepting when you have vacancies in the Royal Victoria Asylum, and for the Roman Catholic educational benefits?—But how can the honourable Member say that it is "dead" when we spend something like 8,000*l.* or 9,000*l.* a year for these objects.

1364. For what objects?—The maintenance and education of children under these two clauses of the Act of 1867.

1365. Then the honourable Member for Guildford asked you whether you could not extend the provisions instead of having a large number of children waiting for admission to these asylums; that is the point of his question, I take it?—Well, of course, it might be extended, but only in the direction of taking away from the money which is allowed for the widows.

Mr. Brodrick.

1366. Why?—Because in all these matters where you have annuities that are payable you must have a corpus against which to calculate your liabilities.

Mr. Kearley.

1367. But you have a visible surplus of 75,000*l.*?—Only this year.

1368. It is a surplus that has been growing for the last 10 years?—It actually decreased in 1891 from 112,000*l.* to 45,000*l.* by the restoration of allowances to re-married women.

Mr. Thomas Bayley.

1369. You have got a lot of deserving cases which you cannot admit into the orphanages, have you not?—At the moment I could not say that that is so. We have got very few waiting as regards the asylum; we have more as regards the Roman Catholic Orphans Fund.

1370. Deserving cases?—All that are admitted to the list of candidates must be accepted as deserving cases.

1371. Are you able to tell the Committee how many cases are waiting for admission which you have passed as deserving cases; about how many, 20 or 30?—I do not think at the present moment there are above a dozen for the Royal Victoria Patriotic Asylum.

Lord Edmund Talbot.

1372. And how many for the Roman Catholic orphanages?—I should say very likely twice that number.

Mr. Kearley.

1373. You said that there had been a diminution in the surplus assets of the Patriotic Fund in 1891; it came down then by 65,000*l.*; it immediately began to rise again, but prior to 1891 these surplus assets were very much larger than they are now: 112,000*l.* in 1890, 111,000*l.* in 1889, 109,000*l.* in 1888, 106,000*l.* in 1887, and so on?—Yes. Well, I pointed out to the honourable Member before when he was pursuing that point that in these earlier years the liability for restoration to full allowances of re-married women on second widowhood would have been far greater than these surpluses would have met, because of the greater numbers that were on the funds in those earlier years; and I think that is easily to be understood by the fact that in the year 1891 when we did undertake the restoration to full allowances of the re-married women on second widowhood, it brought the surplus assets down by no less a sum than 65,000*l.*

1374. But the point of the honourable Member for Guildford is that there are still a large number of children, by your own admission, waiting for educational advantages, and they are not getting them, simply because you have not got vacancies in the Royal Victoria Asylum and in the Roman Catholic Schools?—My answer to that is that I could hardly say it is a large number; I only said it was about a couple of dozen.

Mr. Brodrick.

1375. You said that you have always a large waiting list?—Yes; I did say so then, and I was astonished when I went back into the list to find that we had exhausted it to a great extent.

Mr. Thomas Bayley.

1376. Do the Royal Commissioners give any grant of money to any of the children waiting for entrance into the orphanages?—No, they have not done so.

1377. Nor do they make any contribution to assist them in their schooling in any way?—Only in the shape of admission to orphanages except in the cases I have pointed out, which were limited to the children of officers in the Rodriguez Fund.

Mr. Luttrell.

1378. Would it be possible, do you think, to give us the exact number of those who are waiting?—Certainly.

Chairman.

1379. Is the Committee to understand that the allocation of the funds for the benefit of the children of Roman Catholics has proved to be insufficient for the number of candidates?—I would rather put it in this way: that the number waiting on the Roman Catholic list is generally in excess in proportion of that waiting for the Royal Victoria Patriotic Asylum. The proportion of the Roman Catholic Orphans Fund was fixed in relation to the number of Roman Catholic soldiers and sailors in proportion to those of other persuasions when the money was allocated in 1882.

1380. Those who were claimants from the Crimean War, do you mean?—No, this was in 1882; when the Boys' School was sold, the amount was separated as a Catholic Orphans Fund.

1381. Do you say that the proportion of Roman Catholic children has since that date increased in numbers?—No, I should say that, so far as my own knowledge is concerned, the proportion of Roman Catholic soldiers to those of other denominations in the Army has rather diminished.

1382. Then, how do you explain the fact that the excess of Roman Catholic applicants is uniformly greater than of the others?—I hope I shall not offend anyone from Ireland in pointing out the fact that a great number of candidates come from Ireland, and they do not seem to be quite so thrifty there as perhaps they may be in other parts.

Mr. Brodrick.

1383. Now, coming to the returns; I have not got the returns before me with which you furnished the Committee, but I want to ask you about one case which I have the details of here; it is a typical case; the Commissioners have refused pensions to a certain number, a large number, of soldiers or relations of soldiers, who died in the Crimean War. Now, would you explain to the Committee on what principle the Commissioners refused an application from a widow in a case of this kind: the woman was married to a private soldier before the beginning of the Crimean War; the man served, by your return, for two years and two months in the Crimea, he served therefore through both the Crimean winters, he was away from duty only for a fortnight ill before he died, and he died in the Crimea; he died from bronchitis, presumably due to exposure in the Crimea, and the widow never made an application, never discovered that she could make an application till the year 1894, when her claim was rejected on the ground that there was no proof that his death was due to injuries sustained in the service, or to injury to health received in the service. Now, can you explain to the Committee how the Royal Commissioners could have decided that a man who died of bronchitis after passing through two Crimean winters, and who had served there for two years and two months, and then only left duty for a fortnight, was not to be considered a case within the fund? —You said he died in the Crimea. I should doubt whether such a case existed at all; if he died in the Crimea it must have been in service in the Russian War.

1384. That is the case as you have indicated it to us?—I asked that those returns should be printed so that I might have the facts before me, and I cannot say what the explanation of the particular case that you allude to is.

Mr. Kearley.

1385. Boots is the name?—I can tell you as to that; that woman was considered an unworthy woman.

Mr. Brodrick.

1386. How does that affect the decision?—It is only those who are deserving that can receive the benefits of any charitable fund; and, in this case, the clergyman of the parish admitted the circumstances.

Mr. Luttrell.

1387. What constitutes "deserving"?—Her moral character must be beyond reproach.

1388. The clergyman of the parish speaks to the moral character of the applicant; is that the usual thing?—Not necessarily; that is as far as it goes; very frequently an officer in command, or someone who takes an interest in the local circumstances.

1389. In this case it was the clergyman of the parish?—I am speaking from memory, but I am almost certain it was the clergyman of the parish who gave the particulars of the case which led to its being rejected.

1390. Were they authenticated?—In this particular case it would have been almost a difficulty of the greatest extent to authenticate them after a lapse of 40 years.

Mr. Luttrell—continued.

1391. It would depend very largely upon the report of the clergyman of the parish?—No, the facts speaks for themselves. The woman knew perfectly well that she was entitled to an allowance from the Patriotic Fund, and the application was simply renewed afterwards, I have very little doubt, on the assumption that possibly these circumstances were not known; but in examination they were elucidated.

Commander Bethell.

1392. I suppose, from what you have said, that the character of "deserving" cannot be regained?—The Commissioners, owing to the great number that came under the category of "undeserving" in the earlier stages of the Patriotic Fund (and it has occurred in other funds—for instance, in the Zulu War Fund, no less than 10 were struck off), felt that it was necessary to lay down as a principle that dishonour to the name of the husband, in respect of whose services only the allowance could be granted, was of that character that unless there were very exceptional circumstances no woman could be restored who was thus "undeserving."

Mr. Kearley.

1393. Would that woman's name appear in this return that you made to Parliament in the year 1871?—I could not say; you are asking me a detail beyond my memory.

1394. These conditions are thus expressed in that paper headed "Allowance to Widows," are they not?—Yes, with regard to the moral conduct.

1395. At the time of the formation of the Patriotic Fund?—Or at any time.

1396. I am referring now to the paper that you put in headed "Allowance to Widows," that was drawn up, I understand, at the time of the formation of the Patriotic Fund?—1854–55.

1397. Do you make those conditions apply to every fund that comes under your control?—Certainly, as regards immorality.

1398. And with regard to the Clause 4 in those conditions, where there is something to the effect, that if the woman remains idle she ceases to have a claim on the fund; does that apply to every fund?—In all the funds where that is applicable. When the honourable Member asked me whether those conditions were applicable to the Victoria Fund, I said certainly not.

1399. All those funds to which those conditions are applicable are subject to those conditions?—Certainly; I answered that exactly, as you will see if you turn to my answer.

Mr. Brodrick.

1400. Could you answer a question about the case of a Mrs. Harter, which the chairman has just handed me; do you know her case?—I do.

1401. I will read you the letter she has addressed to the chairman: "Sir, I beg to submit this, my application, for assistance from the Patriotic Fund, to you for favour of consideration sideration, as I have applied on several occasions to the secretary of the fund in vain, as will be seen by copy of letter herewith. I am the widow of Thomas Harter, who was a master-at-arms in the Royal Navy and served on board Her Majesty's ship 'St. Jean d'Acre' before Sebastopol, and on shore in the trenches during the Crimean War, and also in the Baltic Sea. He died of disease contracted during the war in 1869. I was married to him in the year 1840, and am now 71 years of age, almost past work, but have to contrive to keep myself." Now, this is the important point: "My case is already known to the Commissioners, as my sons were educated at the school." Now, if the widow has a sufficient claim for her sons to be educated at the school, is not that the view to take about that primâ facie evidence, that she is eligible herself for some consideration?—On the contrary, I tried to explain to the Committee the manner in which the pecuniary allowances that are granted are limited to the widow; but under the second and third clauses of Section 5 of the Act of 1867 the children obviously became eligible for admission to the school, and, consequently, Mrs. Harter's children were admitted, all of them, and received the benefits.

1402. Is that a bar to Mrs. Harter receiving a benefit later in life?—Not at all, the bar is the first clause; that the death of her husband was not due to service in the Russian War. I have brought down the papers here, and it will illustrate the process adopted in regard to every claim that comes before the Commissioners in their endeavour to fulfil the conditions of Clause 5 of the Patriotic Fund Act of 1867, which enforced upon them that they must have proof that the husband's death was due to wounds or disease contracted in or by the Russian War. Here is the opinion of the Director General of the Naval Medical Department for a number of years, Sir Alexander Armstrong: "There is no evidence of any illness during war that could be associated with the disease for which he was invalided in 1860, or that subsequently proved fatal in 1869. I consider there is no claim." The process of dealing with these claims is to refer all the certificates and the correspondence which are received with the application, together with the evidence obtained from official sources as to the service of the deceased husband, to three referees, one of whom was a medical man who served actually in the war. This is the opinion of Sir Alexander Armstrong, who was Director General of the Naval Medical Department, but all cases are also referred to two other officers who are Commissioners of the Patriotic Fund, and they have all the documents at their private house; this is not done under any hasty examination, but is done entirely by themselves without influence of any kind. In the case in question the other two referees say, "I concur," and one of them was Sir Henry Lefroy. It was impossible to grant the application in this case, because it does not fulfil the conditions according to the view of the Commissioners, after a careful examination of the case, and the provisions of Section 5 of the Act of 1867.

Mr. Kearley.

1403. I see that case in the Return made in 1871?—Yes.

1404. There, you say, you placed her name upon a special list, and the two children were admitted to the school?—Yes.

1405. You contend that the death of her husband was not caused by service in the Russian War?—I say that that was the opinion of the Commissioners, based upon the process under which they examine carefully every case submitted to them.

Mr. Brodrick.

1406. I see that this man was under medical treatment in July 1855 in the Crimea for diarrhœa, and again in 1856 for diarrhœa and dyspepsia, and again in 1858 for catarrh and hæmorrhage from stomach, and then there is the note, "Attended by private practitioners from time to time since the Russian War for an affection of the lungs, and he always considered that the foundation of his disease was laid in the Baltic;" still it was decided that his death was not caused by service in the Russian War?—Certainly, under the process I have indicated.

1407. And under the fifth section of the Act of the 30th and 31st Victoria surely the children assisted were to be children of a man who it was decided had lost his life "in the service of the Crown, or by or in consequence of casualties sustained, or disease contracted, in the service of the Crown;" it was decided that in the case of the children that they were children of a man who had contracted these diseases in the service of the Crown?—It does not necessarily follow that it was so at all. You will see the third clause is that the man "died in or by service under the Crown." The most liberal interpretation is given to that continually.

1408. But then, if he died on service, if this widow is indigent, why is she not eligible for the Rodriguez Fund; has it been so massed with the Patriotic Fund that she is not eligible for it?—I think the honourable Member has not appreciated my answer that in 1867 a change took place in the Rodriguez Fund, and that the number of the liabilities of the first order that the Commissioners had to deal with, that was, those cases which had allowances suspended owing to the financial crisis of 1879 and 1880, had to be dealt with first. The Rodriguez Fund would have been a mere drop in the bucket under those circumstances.

1409. But the position now is, at all events, that you cannot bring a case of that kind on to any special fund unless the death was due to the Russian War; is that so?—Except with the qualification that the Commissioners have now submitted to Her Majesty that they might be authorised to have extended power, which would undoubtedly include the Rodriguez Fund.

1410. Now would you kindly tell us what the definition is in the minds of the Commissioners of the words "indigent and necessitous"?—In regard to the Rodriguez Fund it is clearly stated in Appendix J. of the Eighth Report.

1411. Could you tell us in your own language; you will see if you refer to Appendix J. that it does not state what "indigent and necessitous" means?—Yes, it does; I am answering you as regards the claims to the Rodriguez Fund. "The Committee consider that the condition, 'really indigent and necessitous' exclude (a) persons in the receipt of pensions from Government; (b) allowances from the Patriotic or any other Fund; or (c) of any income from other sources."

1412. Does that mean that if a woman earns 2*s.* 6*d.* a week she cannot have it?—Certainly not; that is self-help.

1413. But would not that be "an income from other sources"?—Certainly not.

1414. If she earned 5*s.* a week what would be the position?—The same if it was earned by her labour; that is self-help; it is not income in the light in which it is put there. The one is possession of an income; the other is earnings.

Commander Bethell.

1415. She is not "indigent," on the other hand?—She would be if it were a small sum; the circumstances would be considered in each case.

Mr. Brodrick.

1416. It is not necessary for her to get to the stage of having to go to the workhouse before she becomes "indigent and necessitous"?—Certainly not.

1417. And, in calculating grants, earnings have no effect in reducing grants?—Certainly not.

1418. Under any funds?—Under any fund whatever.

Mr. Kearley.

1419. May I ask you a question about withdrawing a grant for immoral conduct; do you happen to remember a case at Portsmouth of a woman living in concubinage, she being about 65 years of age, and the man 72?—There may be several cases corresponding to that.

1420. This woman was drawing a pension for some years, and you stopped it, I believe, on this allegation?—Not "allegation."

1421. Fact, if you please; that is so, is it?—Certainly; whatever may be the case alluded to.

Mr. Mowbray.

1422. Do you take any steps from year to year to investigate the question of morality, or wait till some allegation is made?—Our system of life certificates brings the circumstances of each widow before us every quarter, and if there are indications in connection therewith that seem to suggest that there is any irregularity we make inquiry, but we take care that those inquiries are not made in such a way as to prejudice in any way the recipient; but these are certified to so well, and the records generally of the women are so creditable to them, that we do not seek to find out anything connected with the women.

Mr. Kearley.

1423. Do you inquire into the morals of the whole of the women that are on this fund without any distinction of the rank or rating of the husband?—We do not inquire into their morals at all.

Mr. Kearley—continued.

1424. Then, where do you get your information from?—It comes to us very frequently from local sources.

1425. Have you ever had a communication as to the morals of widows other than those who are in the lowest grades?—Certainly.

1426. Have you ever stopped a pension?—Certainly. There is no distinction between one grade and another, absolutely none.

Mr. Bayley.

1427. You say that there were 12 meetings held of the Commissioners; what extent of time does that cover?—The five years, 1890–94.

1428. You have also told us that there are certain trust deeds, and that you cannot get away from these trust deeds. Who made these trust deeds?—The committee that raised the funds in the first instance. I tried to explain that it was an antecedent condition to the acceptance of any funds under trust that the committee that raised the funds should lay down those conditions for the guidance of the Commissioners.

1429. But, really, are not the trust deeds the Acts of Parliament of the 12th of August 1867, and the Act of Parliament of August 1881; do the trust deeds override these two Acts of Parliament, or do the Acts of Parliament override the trust deeds?—The Acts apply only to the Patriotic Fund and to the Rodriguez Fund; all that came to us after the Act of 1867, commencing with the "Captain" Fund in 1872, are governed by legislative action in the Act of 1881, but only as regards the dealing with their surplus. You will find in a Schedule to that Act that it says that subject to the trusts of those deeds the surpluses are to be dealt with.

1430. Have you got copies of those deeds?—Yes, they have been put in; they are in the hands of the printers.

1431. The whole of the deeds governing the fund?—Yes.

1432. I want to ask a question on the Light Brigade (Balaclava) Relief Fund. Henry Wickham, formerly of the 13th Dragoons, made an application to come on that fund on the 10th June 1892, and you wrote him as follows: "The following circumstances disqualify for an allowance from the above fund: (1) receipt of an army pension; (2) receipt of parochial or other charitable relief; (3) admission to a parochial or other public institution; (4) misconduct; and, in any case, your circumstances must always be those of 'privation and want' to justify the issue of any allowance from the fund. I transmit herewith a description return and form of declaration, which should be completed, as required by the form, and thereafter forwarded to me before 20th instant, together with your photograph, as referred to in the description return. If your circumstances are not those of being 'in privation and want' you should not incur the expense of getting your photograph taken, in the belief that you may get an allowance from the fund." Do you mean to say that any man who has been through the Light Brigade, and who has had to apply for parish relief in any particular year during all that time, could not be put on this fund?—Certainly not; that that is not the interpretation of the words "receipt of parish relief"; that is meant to convey to him that if he got an allowance from the Light Brigade Fund he must not take relief from the parish, but if he were in receipt of relief from the parish at the time that he made the application that would be considered absolutely ground for his being granted an allowance from the Light Brigade (Balaclava) Relief Fund.

1433. That is not your wording here: "The following circumstances disqualify for an allowance from the above fund." The man is applying for this allowance at the time, and one of the circumstances is that he must not be in "receipt of parochial or other regular charitable relief"?—I think the honourable Member is under a misapprehension in supposing that that letter was in reply to an application; for I hold the deed in my hand, and Henry Wickham was one of the earliest cases. The name had been given to the Commissioners; the letter was not in reply to an application; his name was in the very first schedule of names of men who were to be relieved from the fund; and we took these names and wrote to them that letter to indicate that an allowance from the Light Brigade (Balaclava) Relief Fund could only be issued under those conditions. It was not intended to convey (and if it did convey it, it was an unfortunate use of words) that if he were in receipt of parochial relief he would not get the allowance.

1434. If a man said, "I have been last winter in receipt of parochial relief," that fact would oblige him, under this letter, not to apply any more?—It has not had that effect. The result is that the allowance follows in almost every case. It is rather to place the man in possession at once of all the conditions which disqualify for an allowance from the fund.

Chairman.

1435. That is to say, that before coming on the fund he would have to surrender any income that he had from parish relief?—Yes.

Mr. Bayley.

1436. Has this man got any pension?—He is dead now; he was certainly one of the first; he was one of the nine, and we were authorised to grant 10 pensions. This will speak for itself: "Your name has been given to this Commission." There may have been other disqualifying circumstances.

1437. To be eligible he had to be "in privation and want"?—Yes.

Mr. Mowbray.

1438. Do I rightly understand that receipt of parish relief is or is not a disqualification?—After the issue of an allowance from the fund, it would be a disqualification.

Mr. Bayley.

1439. But it is not a disqualification before?—Certainly not.

1440. A man can have it before, and then he is taken off the parish when he gets this allowance?—Yes.

1441. How much do you give him?—The deed limits it to 7*s.* a week, with any pension he may receive from the Army, or any other source.

1442. He is allowed to hold a pension, is he, as well as the 7*s.* a week?—Not in addition to the 7*s.* a week.

1443. That is the total that he can get?—That is the total that he can get.

Mr. Mowbray.

1444. And what steps do you take to ascertain that the parish relief is stopped after you have granted the pension?—The life certificate of each recipient of relief from any fund under the administration of the Patriotic Fund Commissioners contains an entry that they have not been in receipt of parish relief. We take that upon their own declaration; but at the same time the declaration has to be made before certain persons whom we ask to test these facts, and they have to be local people, and we accept that if there is no reason to doubt it.

Colonel Wyndham Murray.

1445. With regard to the distressed survivors of the Crimean War, is it necessary, in order to be within the terms of the Patriotic Fund, that women or children to be beneficiaries must be relatives of men who have lost their lives in or in consequence of their service of the Crown?—Certainly, so far as widows are concerned, it is absolutely limited to those who can produce acceptable evidence that the death of their husbands was due to wounds or disease contracted in the Russian War.

1446. But they must be widows of men who have died in the war?—Or other dependants, do you mean?

1447. No; I mean to say that no survivors of the war can receive any benefit?—Soldiers? No, certainly not. There is a misapprehension abroad to that effect. I get continually such applications, and I am obliged to inform them that they are under a misapprehension.

1448. Crimean soldiers apply constantly to me to ask if any fund is available for them, and I have not been able as yet to answer satisfactorily?—The Patriotic Fund cannot be applied under any circumstances, except to widows.

1449. Is it the case that the first impulse which started the Patriotic Fund was before the landing in the Crimea, when public sympathy had been directed to the condition of the wives and families of soldiers who had only a small trifle out of the soldiers' pay, just before the war commenced?—There is nothing, so far as the records of the Patriotic Fund go, to enable me to answer directly the honourable Member's question; but in looking through correspondence I have distinct evidence that before the creation of the fund which is administered by the Royal Commissioners of the Patriotic Fund, there existed associations in almost every village and town in England for the assistance of the wives of soldiers who were left destitute by reason of there being no machinery existing at that time for their maintenance.

1450. Has it come to the knowledge of the Commissioners that there are many men who were wounded in the Russian war, and who are in very poor circumstances in many cases from want of work which they are unable to do in consequence of their wounds, which were contracted in the Russian campaign, and that their dependent relations also are in very poor circumstances?—Undoubtedly.

1451. Has the advisability ever been considered by the Commissioners of men who were wounded in the Russian war, or their dependent relations in very poor circumstances, being allowed to receive any of the benefits of this fund?—It has always been held that the terms of the original Commission absolutely precluded any one but widows and orphans from being the recipients of the benefits.

1452. And is it their view that no recommendation should be made to Parliament for authority to use the fund in any other way such as I have indicated?—I would suggest that any such benefactions would require a far greater corpus than can possibly be derived from any funds to be administered by the Patriotic Fund Commissioners.

1453. Regarding the Balaclava Fund, is there any other fund of that nature which could be applied in that manner to other survivors besides the men who were engaged in the Balaclava charge?—That is the only fund that has been entrusted to the Royal Commissioners of the Patriotic Fund for the benefit of soldiers, and there was a doubt as to whether the Commissioners could undertake the administration of that fund, but the Lord Chancellor, who was a Patriotic Fund Commissioner, advised that it could be undertaken; but it is the only fund that we have for soldiers.

1454. I should like to ask a question regarding the Rodriguez Fund that was for the relief of families of English subjects wounded or dying in the wars; could you say why the Commissioners decided that they must be relations of men who died in consequence of the wars; I do not think that has been brought out yet; it is simply said in the trust that it is to be for the benefit of men "wounded or dying in the wars"?—I can only refer the honourable Member to the Appendix J., which was a definition of the views held by the Commissioners when they received the Rodriguez Fund as to how they should apply it.

1455. The wording is actually, "men wounded or dying in the wars"; but I think no men wounded in the wars have received any benefit?—Certainly not, because the Commissioners, if you look lower down, decided that the cases that could come under the Rodriguez Fund were only those cases of the families of men who died whilst engaged in war for whom no special assistance had been provided in the shape of charitable funds.

Mr. Bayley.

1456. It is clearly intended for the families of English subjects wounded or dying in the wars?—The honourable Member says "clearly," but I think the cross-examination on the point shows that it has been a very difficult matter indeed. It would have been a good thing if it had been clear what was the intention. From the very first the Commissioners have felt it a matter of difficulty.

Mr. Bayley—continued.

1457. As to the Zervudachi Fund, there were no conditions as to the disposal of that fund?—It was purely a donation to His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge from Sir Constantine Zervudachi without conditions.

1458. And ratified by a supplemental Commission?—No. A supplemental Commission is a document which is necessary to carry out any direction of the Legislature in regard to the application of any fund; but the Zervudachi Fund having given as a donation would not, except as a matter of policy, come under any Act of Parliament or supplemental Commission.

1459. Has it been decided what shall be done with this fund?—Yes; it is really being administered at the present moment for the benefit of such few cases as may exist of widows of soldiers who died in the wars for which no public subscription was raised; but as I explained to the Committee, no one was put on the fund until this year, and we have placed one on it this year, and there is another being placed on it now.

Commander Bethell.

1460. Other witnesses were asked, I think, by Mr. Kearley, and other honourable Members, whether, in their judgment, it would be possible to lump all these funds, and use the proceeds as a lump revenue. I should like to ask you whether, in your judgment, with due regard to the trusts, it would be possible to carry out such a policy?—I would like to refer the honourable Member to my answer to Question 1083.

1461. Have you been asked that question; I did not think you had?—It was not quite directly, but I introduced a certain point which was of the first importance in connection with the point that the honourable Member is asking me.

1462. I may gather from that answer that in your judgment that policy could not be pursued; I mean to say with a due regard to the trusts which the Commissioners, I suppose, are bound to regard?—The Commissioners are bound by the policy indicated by the Legislature in Section 4 of the Act of 1881 in reference to surpluses; and what I would wish the Committee to appreciate is that the Commissioners must have various considerations in their minds in deciding as to the actual time at which they can deal with the surplus of any fund. I indicated that, in the case of the Patriotic Fund, they have come to the conclusion that they could deal with it as I said, because the fund has been 40 years in existence, and all the women are becoming aged, and they, further, have applied the fund in a manner, as they consider, adequate to the relief of those recipients; but, in regard to the other funds, there are none of them that have as yet reached that longevity that would, in the opinion of the Commissioners, necessitate the dealing with the surpluses.

1463. I rather want to get your opinion of the policy policy that was rather suggested in the questions put to you by two or three honourable Members; they asked if it would not be better on the whole that all these funds should be lumped, and the revenues arising therefrom be treated as a whole?—I should say that that would be manifestly unadvisable in the present state of those funds which have got some distance to run in the shape of young annuitants upon them.

1464. A period will come, of course, when the beneficiaries under existing trusts will die out, and then the incomes arising would have to be treated by Parliament?—That is so; and I would like to amplify that by stating that, in the case of the "Eurydice" Fund, there is a provision in the deed which absolutely prohibits the Commissioners from dealing with the surplus until the last annuitant is gone.

1465. With regard to the Rodriguez Fund, about which you have been asked so much, the present Commissioners might, of course, review that interpretation which was originally given of the words "indigent and necessitous;" only there is no object in doing that, I presume, since the Act of 1881 has lumped that fund with the Patriotic Fund?—The honourable Member puts it in exactly the way that I wish it to be appreciated by the Committee; that its being lumped with the Patriotic Fund has absolutely changed the conditions, and if Her Majesty's Government advise an extension of the powers of the Commissioners, that will follow.

1466. However much the Commissioners might disagree with the interpretation originally given "to indigent and necessitous," there is now no longer occasion to give a fresh interpretation?—None whatever, subject to the issue of the Supplemental Commission under the Act of 1881.

Mr. Mowbray.

1467. Have you made a formal application for that Commission yet?—We have.

Commander Bethell.

1468. The machinery of this Patriotic Fund Committee, I gather, is not at all adapted to giving instantaneous relief in the case of accidents occurring; the inquiries it has to institute, and so on, are more suited for giving permanent relief over a considerable time rather than upon the immediate occurrence of the accident being able to give instantaneous relief to those who suffer?—On the contrary, I should say that if our machinery was not equal to affording an immediate relief it would be a blemish. In regard to the Victoria Fund, if the honourable Member will refer to the letter I wrote to the Secretary to the Admiralty I undoubtedly stated there that we were prepared to grant immediate relief, and we should have done so.

1469. I thought I gathered from your evidence that there might have been some difficulty about the meeting of these cases if it were not that the local committees were able to give immediate relief?—But I claim for the Commissioners the power to institute those local committees with as great power as anybody can claim.

1470. Then in your judgment the Commission as at present constituted is quite equal to giving instantaneous relief?—In paragraph 31 of my statement I say, "The Commission can always likewise count upon obtaining the services of local committees specially versed in the circumstances and needs of sufferers by casualties in the Navy and Army arising from war or other causes incidental to the naval and military service. This was illustrated in the case of the 'Victoria' Relief Fund, where the local committees, especially at Portsmouth, were applying adequately relief which poured in locally, and happily prevented the relief to be afforded from the central fund from overlapping such local relief."

1471. You say that in your judgment the machinery is suited to that purpose?—I am perfectly certain that local committees can be started for immediate relief at any time we desire.

1472. I do not know whether this is a question that you can properly answer: In your judgment as Secretary of the Commission would it be better if the Commission were reduced in numbers?—Certainly not.

Mr. Mowbray.

1473. One question on the general principle of these smaller funds. Ultimately I understand that their surpluses will be applied under a new Commission, in the same way as the Patriotic Fund and the Rodriguez Fund, but now, as a matter of principle, do you consider yourselves justified in providing any surplus at all, or do you consider your duty to be to increase the allowances to the annuitants under the fund so as not to leave a surplus at all?—The policy, undoubtedly, in the case of any funds before the "Victoria" Fund, was to adequately relieve the recipients. That, of course, is a matter of opinion in connection with the administration by the Commissioners. What they have considered in regard to the Patriotic Fund as adequate relief is indicated in the 32nd Report, where the allowances are detailed. The "Captain" and the "Eurydice" Fund, as following the Patriotic Fund, would have the same rates; but they do not, of course, consider they are bound to exhaust each fund for the benefit of the recipients.

Commander Bethell.

1474. You say that they do not consider that they are bound to, but have they any right to exhaust the fund?—Certainly not under the trust deeds. The trust deeds indicate distinctly that the relief that is afforded by the scale of allowances there is adequate relief for the time being, but they give the power to the Commissioners to increase it if they think it necessary, and the Commissioners have increased it in old age.

Mr. Mowbray.

1475. But your test is the adequacy of the relief in each case?—Yes.

1476. And if a larger amount of money has been granted than necessary for the individual case you consider yourselves justified, as a matter of practice, in providing a surplus which shall ultimately be applied to some other purpose?—On the principle that the loss to the widow in the case by the death of the bread-winner is in all circumstances the same, whatever the cause of the disaster.

Mr. Mowbray—continued.

Lord Edmund Talbot.

1477. With regard to the application for admission to the orphanages, I understand that those who are waiting for admission to the asylum are waiting for want of room in the asylum?—That is so.

1478. With regard to the Roman Catholic applicants, they are waiting not for want of room in the Roman Catholic orphanages, but for want of funds?—That is so.

1479. You have given us a figure with regard to the Roman Catholic children, but I do not think you have told us on what basis that figure was fixed?—In the 20th Report of the Commissioners to Her Majesty will be found the circumstances under which the allocation of a certain sum of money due from the Roman Catholic Orphans' Fund was laid down: "We have now directed that when the sale of the boys' school has taken place the sum of 35,000*l.* shall be set aside for the education and maintenance of Roman Catholic children, and that the said sum shall be invested in separate securities, and kept distinct from the other portions of the fund." There was a Committee which sat, the Report of which will be found in Appendix II. of that 20th Report, in which you will see that the allocation took place upon the proportion of Roman Catholics to the other religious beliefs in the Army in these words——

1480. At that date?—At that date.

1481. Will you tell us the date?—The date was in November 1881; and that worked out "that for both services combined the proportion of Roman Catholics is nearly one-fifth of the whole. The Protestant Endowment, 140,000*l.*, therefore represents four-fifths of the whole educational endowment, which would thus be 175,000*l.*; Protestants, four-fifths, which equals 140,000*l.*; Roman Catholics, one-fifth, which equals 35,000*l.*; total, 175,000*l.*" And that was the basis upon which the allocation was made under the second and third sub-clauses of Section 5 of the Patriotic Fund Act of 1867.

1482. And practically for the time being it remains as fixed in 1881, and there is no attempt from time to time to vary it?—No, it would be scarcely possible to vary it without a certain amount of, perhaps, injustice; for instance, if you were to take the proportion of the present day you would find, for the reasons I gave before, that the Roman Catholics would not have such a large proportion as they had in 1881, and that therefore the amount that would have to be applied to-day would be less than that allocated in 1881.

Mr. Thomas Bayley.

1483. You say that you have more applications in proportion from Roman Catholics for orphanages than from the Protestant orphans?—That is so.

1484. But I see that the 35,504*l.* brought in last year an income of 1,415*l.* 16*s.* 8*d.*?—Yes.

1485. And that you only spent 1,299*l.* 4*s.* 1*d.*?—Well, I would submit to the honourable Member that that is a very near margin.

Mr. Thomas Bayley—continued.

1486. But you had 116*l.* which you could have used if you had used all your income?—Yes, but you could not run it out exactly. There are many charges that come upon the fund that we cannot tell till we get the accounts from the orphanages. What I mean to convey is this, we could not run out exactly the income each year. I can assure you that the committee do try to run it out, and in one year we overstepped it.

1487. There is money there, and you could have put more children on it?—But still that goes into the corpus of the fund.

1488. I am now going to the Royal Victoria Patriotic Asylum. Your income there was 6,523*l.* 9*s.* 9*d.*, and your expenses were 7,110*l.* 10*s.* 4*d.*, an increase of expenses?—Yes, that was caused by structural alterations; it was not spent upon relief of orphans; it was spent on improving the conditions under which they are maintained in the asylum.

Mr. Cochrane.

1489. The Roman Catholic Home is in Ayrshire, is it not?—There is a convent there in which we place Scotch cases.

1490. How many children are there in the home at Girvan?—There is only one at the present time at Girvan. I explained that we get very few cases from Scotland.

1491. Is that one orphan a Scotch Roman Catholic?—Yes. The case came from Glasgow. It does not necessarily follow that cases will be limited to that one. If half-a-dozen deserving cases coming from Scotland, in the opinion of the committee, were more deserving than those from England, the number would be increased at Girvan.

1492. How many Scotch cases are there at Girvan altogether?—That is the only one which I can say is purely Scotch; there may be cases at Norwood and Torquay.

1493. May I ask you how many Scotch Presbyterians there are within the homes in various places?—I am sorry to say we have none.

Captain Norton.

1494. In your opinion, am I justified in gathering that the general policy of the Commissioners has been one of extreme caution in the direction of economy?—"In the direction of economy," you say; but economy of what?

1495. General economy; whether you consider the funds very economically managed?—I can say that certainly since the crisis in the affairs of the Commission in 1880 that principle has been striven after most assiduously.

1496. You might describe it as a policy of accumulation?—Oh, certainly not. I mistook the honourable Member's question. I was trying to get at what he meant by economising, and he said management, and I was interpreting it in reference to cost of management.

1497. Has the result of that management been an accumulation of funds, or a dissipation of funds?—It has been both.

1498. Were not the funds, as a whole, intended for immediate use?—The intentions of the funds are expressed in the trust deeds of each each fund, and the Commissioners claim that they have carried out those intentions.

1499. But if they had carried out those intentions, surely many of the funds would have decreased instead of increasing; whereas there has been a desire to make these funds produce surpluses?—On the contrary, the "Captain" Fund and the "Eurydice" Fund contemplated surpluses, and there are provisions in the deeds dealing with these matters.

1500. Would you say that the fund had been administered more in the interests of the seniors in the service than of those in the lower grades?—I should say that it was desired to be administered entirely in accordance with the principles laid down in each of the trust deeds, which must speak for themselves.

1501. But, in your opinion, has that been done?—Certainly; I made that claim on behalf of the Commissioners, that the conditions of every trust that has been committed to them by trust deeds have been faithfully carried out.

1502. The total loss sustained in connection with the boys' school, roughly speaking, what would you put that at?—I think it was under 1,000*l.*; it was 32,680*l.*, I think, that it cost, and we got back 32,000*l.* by the sale of it.

1503. Was it out of this that that sum of 35,000*l.* was allocated to the Roman Catholic children?—Yes; that I have just explained.

1504. Then you stated that a sum of money was spent in structural alterations in connection with the other asylum; if that were so, that would be indirectly adding money, as it were, to the Protestant side, and thereby penalising, as it were, the Roman Catholic children; is not that so?—On the contrary; the honourable Member has not appreciated the fact which I explained just now, that the Endowment Fund was allocated in that year upon the principle that obtained at that time; but the expenditure in structural alterations of the Royal Victoria Patriotic Asylum is out of the Endowment Fund; it is not taken out of the Roman Catholic Fund, or to the prejudice of any fund at all, but from its own endowment.

1505. But the Roman Catholics are unable to avail themselves of that institution?—But they could not avail themselves of the Endowment Fund allocated to the other institution.

1506. Have the Commissioners any right under these deeds you speak of to, as it were, allocate the money in the interests of the Protestants as against the Roman Catholics?—I claim, as I remarked when answering the honourable Member at your side, that the Roman Catholics rather gained than otherwise in the allocation that took place in 1881; and that it would be unadvisable to shift it continually according to the proportion there might be in any given year of the Roman Catholics to the other religious persuasions that there might be in the Army and Navy.

1507. Therefore, the Protestants have the benefit of that?—The honourable Member is assuming what is quite contrary to the fact. The allocation took place upon the proportion that the religious beliefs bore at that date. The Endowment Fund for the Royal Victoria Patriotic Asylum has been kept perfectly distinct from the Roman Catholic Orphans' Fund. The Roman Catholic Orphans' Fund has increased from the income not having been spent in each year; it has increased to the amount it stands at to-day. The Royal Victoria Patriotic Asylum Fund in the same way has increased by the amount required for the maintenance of the asylum not having been perhaps fully expended in every year. Therefore, the Commissioners were able to apply out of the increased amount a certain sum towards structural alterations which appears in this year's account; and that is the whole explanation of the increased expenditure in the year 1894.

1508. Nevertheless, you do not deny the fact that at the present moment there are double the number of Roman Catholic applicants waiting for relief as compared with Protestants?—No, I do not deny that; that is another thing.

1509. Then that would rather tend to show that Catholicism has been penalised?—I certainly cannot admit that.

1510. It is a drawback to a soldier who dies of wounds or diseases contracted abroad if he happens to be a Roman Catholic, because, if he happens to be a Roman Catholic, the chances as regards his child getting relief are only one-half, owing to the fact that at the present moment there are double the number of Roman Catholics in waiting?—No, I should rather put it in this way: that the proportion of Protestants who require relief is less than those of the Roman Catholic religion from causes which it would be impossible for me to inquire into; but there is no penalisation of Roman Catholics so far as the administration of the fund is concerned.

Mr. Cochrane.

1511. You said the number was allocated according to religious belief?—That is to say, the proportion that the Roman Catholics bore to the rest of the Army.

1512. The others were lumped together?—Yes.

1513. The Presbyterians included?—All.

1514. And the Wesleyans?—You may take it all. The totals were taken into consideration. There is a religious return for both the Navy and Army furnished every year to Parliament, and it is from those returns that the calculations were made.

1515. Then there was no separate allocation in the case of the Wesleyans or the Presbyterians?—None; because the Royal Victoria Patriotic Asylum was intended originally to be absolutely without regard to creed. It was only the circumstances detailed in the early reports, which I need not refer to, which led to those of the Roman Catholic persuasion making a claim for a separate endowment.

1516. I think earlier in your evidence you stated that there were some special facilities for the Wesleyans?—Only as regards religious instruction in the Patriotic Asylum. I endeavoured to show that in pursuance of the policy that the asylum should be open to all creeds we, in the case of the Wesleyans, anticipating that we would be able to get some in, because the reverend gentleman who is charged with looking after the Wesleyan sailors and soldiers said he would would like to get some cases in, made regulations to meet his requirements for religious instruction apart from that of the Church of England.

Mr. Kearley.

1517. When you built the Royal Victoria Asylum, you built a chapel and appointed a Church of England chaplain, and that gave rise to all these quarrels?—I think the honourable Member will find that there was not a chapel originally: it was not at the inception of the Patriotic Asylum, but afterwards.

1518. Certainly before 1860?—I do not know that it was before 1860.

1519. I would not fix you to a year, but there was the fact that you only made religious provision there on the principles of the Church of England, and that gave rise in the end to heart-burnings among the other religious bodies who had children in the asylum?—But if the honourable Member has experience of the condition of the religious instruction in the services, he knows perfectly well that the chapels are used in common by members of the Church of England, Roman Catholics, Wesleyans, and Presbyterians.

1520. But they are not ministered to by the same chaplain?—But we could make the same arrangement in the chapel at Wandsworth for Roman Catholics.

1521. All that controversy that has taken place in Parliament (I have read the debates) centred round this very point of your establishing a Church of England school?—But is not that all ancient history?

1522. It bears upon all these questions?—It is not applicable to the present time.

1523. But the Roman Catholic Orphans' Fund is the outcome of this dispute?—Certainly.

Captain Norton.

1524. You made some statement with reference to the Irish not being so thrifty, I think; at the moment I did not catch in connection with what you made that remark; in answer to what question?—I put it merely as a suggestion; I said that it was possible that the proportion of applicants for admission to orphanages being greater for the Roman Catholic orphanages than for the Royal Patriotic Asylum was caused by the fact that a great number came from Ireland, and that consequently it might be inferred that there was not the same amount of thrift in their families; but I only threw that out as a possible cause. I did not wish to make it in any sense whatever as an offensive remark.

1525. You stated on some former occasion that adequate steps were taken to place the rank and file under the benefits to which they were entitled under these various funds; might I ask if any such steps were taken as advertising in the "Broad Arrow," say, and "Sheldrick's Gazette," at Aldershot, such papers as are usually read by the rank and file of the Army?—I answered a similar question by saying that we have not resorted to advertisement, but that the proof of our everyday life is that the Patriotic Fund is very well known at Aldershot and at all the principal centres, whether naval or military.

1526. I think you said that almost any soldier that you met at Aldershot, more especially if he were a married man, would know the existence of these funds: that was your opinion?—The honourable Member for Devonport put it to me in that way, and I answered it by saying that I could say that the Patriotic Fund was very well known at Aldershot, but I did not go the length of saying that every soldier knew of the Patriotic Fund.

1527. My experience would go to show that certainly a very small percentage of the men of the rank and file who would take advantage of these funds know anything at all about them?—That is an assumption that the rank and file could take advantage of the fund, or would be entitled to take advantage of the fund.

1528. For example, take the Soldiers' Effects Fund; I think one has been asked thousands of times by soldiers what becomes of the money that is left by their comrades who die without any next-of-kin, or without any next-of-kin being found. Now, in connection with that fund, I would like to know whether, for example, in the various parishes in Ireland, when a man dies and is known to come from a certain locality, the Patriotic Fund Commissioners ever communicate with the parish priests?—Very frequently; we have a large number of annuitants in Ireland, and I should say that the Patriotic Fund was as well known throughout the length and breadth of Ireland as any other institution for the relief of widows and orphans.

1529. And yet out of an income of over 4,000*l.* only 1,000*l.* was expended of the Soldiers' Effects Fund?—That was not from want of knowledge of it, but from the administrative principle which governs us, that it is only for the widows and orphans of those who die from war disease or injury by service of a certain nature, but not ordinary service. I pointed out that if it were applied to widows and orphans of ordinary cases the fund would require to be millions instead of 100,000*l.* odd.

1530. Then if what I have called the policy of accumulation has not been followed, surely there is no reason why only one-fourth of this should be expended; because you cannot relieve all the cases you refuse to relieve any; that is, broadly speaking, the principle?—No; the Commissioners do not refuse to relieve; they are following the policy indicated by the Secretary of State, who, in handing over the fund, said, that in his opinion, the fund after meeting the cases due to war service should be allowed to accumulate.

1531. Then, my point is this: that you have not made an effort, as it were, to stem the accumulations, or extend the application of the fund?—On the contrary, we are following out the policy indicated by the Secretary of State in accumulating.

1532. Out of any of these funds, out of the Rodriguez Fund and the Zervudachi Fund, I take it it would be possible to relieve soldiers of extreme old age who have no alternative but to go upon the parish?—On the contrary, it would be ultra vires of every legislative enactment, of the Royal Commissions and the trust deeds, except that of the Light Brigade (Balaclava) Relief

Relief Fund, to spend one single penny for the benefit of the soldiers or sailors themselves; absolutely ultra vires.

1533. Are the funds in connection with the Military Tournament and the Naval Exhibition handed over to you; have you had any of those funds?—We have not.

1534. You stated that recently a great saving had been effected by the amalgamation of funds; can it be shown that there has been a corresponding increase of expenditure?—Certainly not, in regard to the point I referred to, which was that instead of selling out stock in the case of funds where it was required to meet expenditure and in other funds, where the income exceeded the expenditure, buying in, we transferred them in our books without incurring expense by selling out and buying in in the ordinary course, on the Stock Exchange; and that goes on every year to the benefit of funds.

1535. To the benefit of the funds in contradistinction to the benefit of those who ought to receive the benefits from the funds?—I do not follow the honourable Member in this matter at all, because it is purely a matter of economy of administration.

1536. But when you make any economy of administration you do not attempt to widen the scope, that is to say, you do not attempt to relieve cases that are on your books; there are a large number of children waiting to get into this asylum; for example, you get an increase of funds, but you do not attempt to place any of those children out in the way the Protestant orphan children in Ireland are placed out; you do not attempt to relieve the widows in distress; you do not attempt to relieve those children of the soldiers who have died and whose widows are in distress?—Because in the opinion of the Commissioners they are fulfilling their trusts and their obligations imposed upon them by the Legislature.

1537. In fact, the saving that has been effected has been accumulated; the benefit of the saving effected from the amalgamation has not gone to those interested?—I would not claim for these economies I am referring to anything very great.

1538. But such as they are, they have been for the benefit of the fund?—But even if applied in the way the honourable Member suggests the result would be infinitesimal.

1539. It may be ever so small, but they are not applied in that direction. So I gather rightly that the War Office is never communicated with by the Patriotic Commissioners?—It is continually being communicated with; we are in touch very continually with the War Office; one of the Commissioners is the Accountant General of the Army, and the Permanent Under Secretary of State is also a Commissioner, and no two men take greater interest in the administration of the Patriotic Fund.

1540. I mean that when an application was made to the War Office, and the War Office by their regulations are unable to deal with it, it was not the practice of the War Office to immediately send it on to the Royal Patriotic Commissioners?—But that does not reflect on the Patriotic Fund Commissioners.

1541. Rather on the War Office?—I do not know that.

1542. With reference to the administration of the Royal Patriotic Fund all the way through, would you say that the administration compared favourably with the way in which the Admiralty themselves administer their funds?—I would rather not express an opinion upon such a comparison at all.

1543. With reference to the Rodriguez Fund, am I justified in saying that the Commissioners place their own interpretation upon how they should use it?—That is clearly so; I have indicated that, I hope, clearly.

1544. And this Zervudachi Fund was never dealt with until this year?—I could not say that that was quite a fair assumption. Nothing has been spent from it, but the earlier circumstances of its administration show that it would have been applied to the full, and very likely exhausted for the benefit of the widows and orphans of men who lost their lives in Egypt in the first campaign of 1882, if it had not been for the transfer from the War Office in 1884 of the Soldiers' Effects Fund, which was more than adequate to provide for all the widows and orphans, not only of that campaign, but the subsequent campaigns up to the present time.

1545. Then you acknowledge that the Royal Commissioners have failed to deal with this fund; they have not carried out the instructions of the donor?—The donor gave no instructions.

1546. I thought in each instance there was a deed?—I explained a little while ago to another honourable Member that in this case there were no conditions attached; it was a donation given to his Royal Highness out of gratitude by Sir Constantine Zervudachi for the conduct of our forces in Egypt, Alexandria particularly.

1547. And it having been handed over to the Royal Commissioners, the Royal Commissioners follow out the usual course of hoarding it up?—I do not admit that at all. I have tried to explain the circumstances under which there were no allowances up to this present year, but I do not admit that it was on the hoarding-up principle at all.

1548. At any rate, you will admit that it was not expended?—I do, and I have explained that.

1549. In your opinion it would be quite impossible to lump the funds and divide them, handing over that portion meant for the Royal Navy and the Royal Marines, and so forth, to the Admiralty, and handing over the rest to a Department of the War Office, that would not be workable, you think?—I would not wish to express any such opinion; it is quite beyond me to express an opinion upon a point of that kind.

Mr. Cochrane.

1550. As to the County of Forfar Fund; it is a small fund with only two annuitants, I think?—Yes.

1551. Are they widows of soldiers?—Widows of soldiers, it happens.

1552. And you said you paid a visit to Forfarshire, and you discovered a good many widows deserving but not placed on the fund?—I happened to be in Forfarshire one autumn, and I paid a visit to the county authorities there, and learned that in their endeavours to place upon this this County of Forfar Fund the most deserving widows they could find, they found that there were a good many that were very deserving, and that if they had had the funds they would have been very delighted to have placed on the funds some more widows, they were so deserving.

1553. Do you think that in the counties in Scotland there are many deserving cases which might be relieved with advantage?—I am quite sure that through the length and breadth of the land there is many a deserving widow of a sailor or soldier that could be found to be relieved from charitable funds.

1554. Do you think that any extension of the provisions of these various funds could be made to relieve some, at least, of these deserving cases?—In the case of the Patriotic Fund, it is the hope of the Commissioners that they may be empowered by Parliament, acting on the advice of the Government of the day, to apply the surplus of the Patriotic Fund in that direction.

1555. I did not understand from your evidence in chief whether the funds are entirely kept for the widows of soldiers married with leave, who are on the strength of the regiment, or whether any widows of soldiers married without leave are on the fund?—So far as any funds raised for special objects are concerned, no distinction of any kind is made in that direction; with regard to the Soldiers' Effects Fund, it is one of the provisions of the Royal Warrant, which the Commissioners are bound to observe, that preferential consideration is given to those on the married establishment; but even in those cases, where war service has deprived a woman of her husband, that has not been held to be a bar.

1556. Do you think that that restriction cuts out many deserving cases?—Not in regard to war service or special disaster; certainly not.

Mr. Bayley.

1557. Out of the money of the Patriotic Fund you pay 25,000*l.* to the Wellington College, and in return for that you have nominations for 18 orphans; that would be in perpetuity, I suppose?—In perpetuity.

1558. And those are the children, I suppose, of officers?—Of officers.

1559. Who have died of wounds received in the Crimean War?—No; there are now very few of those cases; in fact, I should say, hardly any. It is, in fact, any military or marine officer.

1560. That belongs to the Patriotic Fund establishment, which is in accordance with the Act of Parliament, for the children of those who die in that way?—The honourable Member has again lost sight of the second and third Subclauses of Section 5, which extended it practically to anybody.

1561. Are all these 18 who are receiving their training at Wellington College children of officers who have died in Her Majesty's service?—I should hardly say so. You see the wars have been very few of late, but we generally give preference to war service.

1562. They are all orphan children?—All fatherless, certainly; we could not give it to anyone else.

Mr. Mowbray.

1563. The nominations are given by you after inquiry in each case?—Yes, we keep a list of candidates as we do for everyone of our institutions and orphanges, and when there is a vacancy in our nominations the claims of all on the list go before a special sub-committee who select the cases they think most deserving.

Mr. Egerton Allen.

1564. To go back to the religious question, have you ever had an application from a Baptist family or father to put a child on the fund?—Not within my experience.

1565. I suppose if there were such there would be some provision for them?—There is no distinction whatever.

1566. I have found in applying to the War Office, though they recognised the Baptist persuasion later on, that there was a distinction made in the War Office between the Wesleyan persuasion and the Baptist persuasion, but there would be in your case no distinction made?—What I wish to convey to the honourable Member is that religion would be no bar to the admission of an orphan to the Royal Victoria Patriotic Asylum.

1567. And to supplying them with any instruction which their parents desired for them?—Quite so.

Mr. Kearley.

1568. I find that in 1880 the question of pensioning employés of the Patriotic Fund Commission was dealt with, and I see that there is a charge on the fund at the present moment for retired officers of the Patriotic Fund of 638*l*, which is nearly two-thirds of the salaries of the present active staff. Then in this correspondence in this return of the sub-committee made to Parliament, it was there set forth that in future (I am reading paragraph 18 on page 3 of the report of the sub-committee): "The appointment of Secretary, upon new terms, might be made from the list of retired officers in the Army and Navy, or of the Civil Departments connected therewith, and he and the clerks should clearly understand that it is a condition of their employment that they have no claims to pensions." Do you mind my asking you whether you have any claim to a pension?—Yes, I have a claim to a pension.

1569. In the face of this express condition, the Patriotic Commissioners have allowed that?—The circumstances of that time have been altered entirely by the permanence given to the Commission by the legislation of 1881. Those circumstances were circumstances of financial disaster for one thing and for another, it was still undecided then as to whether the Patriotic Fund Commission would be continued; therefore, that notice was put in.

1570. But they object here to the principle of pensioning employés. Look at Clause 20?—I know the reference quite well.

1571. I will read Clause 20 of the same Return: "We have no information as to the grounds on which the late secretary was awarded a pension of 300*l.* a year, but we assume that the present position of the fund may require that this award should be reviewed." Has that award ever been reviewed?—You are referring referring to the first secretary; that was Captain Fishbourne; he is dead now.

1572. Then you have an expectation of a pension?—I have certainly a just expectation.

1573. In the face of this report of the Sub-Committee?—I do not know about "in the face of that"; I have nothing to do with that, but I have a just expectation under a Royal Warrant.

1574. You already draw an Army pension as a retired officer, I believe?—That is in respect of my Army service.

1575. The suggestion here is that they might employ a new secretary on new terms "from the list of retired officers in the Army and Navy, or of the Civil Departments connected therewith." I know it is the practice that all retired pensioned officers who are employed after retirement in recruiting, &c., up to the age of 60 or 65, have no claim thereby to an extra pension. Do you know the clause I am referring to?—I know the clause to which you are referring.

1576. However, this point was never raised in your case?—My appointment took place a considerable time after that.

1577. After 1880?—1887. They gave pensions, as a matter of fact, to everyone after 1881.

1578. Here was this joint report of the Sub-Committee, and there is the question of the heavy liability thrown on the fund, and we see that there is a heavy liability, notwithstanding that one pensioned employé is dead, which is still 638*l.*, which represents two-thirds of the salaries of the active staff. In spite of these strong expressions of opinion from that joint Sub-Committee the Patriotic Fund Commission went behind them and continued to pension their employés?—I would not like to say that the Patriotic Fund Commissioners went behind them, for the Patriotic Fund Commissioners said that they could could not possibly treat their employés in that way.

Chairman.

1579. In the opinion of the Commissioners there has never been any difference in regard to the policy they should pursue as to the main lines of their policy, since the first formation of the Commission down to the present day. I am speaking now particularly upon the point which so many Members have examined you upon, as to whether the widows and children of those who have lost their lives in the service of their country under conditions which they specified, have any claim on that account to participate in the fund. You have always required, if I have not mistaken your evidence, that the claimants should prove that they were unable to maintain or support themselves without such aid?—Clearly so, under the original Commission of October 1854.

1580. And you have persistently endeavoured to encourage recipients to maintain a spirit of independence in their mode of life, and to pursue such industrial occupations as they were capable of?—That is so, clearly.

1581. Then in what the Commissioners have regarded as the equitable application of those benefits, they have desired so to economise their funds as to ensure that they should always be equal to satisfying the demands which they themselves have encouraged, and to be prepared for such other demands as might be made upon them of a kind which did not make them appeal to the public benevolence in such a way as when these more conspicuous disasters have occurred?—That is entirely in accordance with the facts.

1582. Then you have further called our attention to the fact that Parliament by the Act of 1881 practically recognised the work of the Commissioners as permanent, and directed the manner in which surpluses accumulated should be dealt with?—That is so. May I before I leave hand in the return of the attendances to which I referred at the beginning of my evidence to-day?

Sir GERALD FITZGERALD, K.C.M.G., called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

1583. You are Accountant General of the Navy?—Yes.

1584. In the course of the inquiry the Members of the Committee have heard from time to time of the practice of the Admiralty in dealing with families of seamen on service in remote parts of the world. Will you explain to us what are the facilities that are offered in regard to the receipt of such portions of the earnings of seamen as are allotted to the support of their families at home?—Every sailor can allot an amount of money to his family when he goes abroad, according to the pay he himself receives, and this allotment is paid to the allottees through the post offices at the commencement of every month.

1585. In that respect your process differs from that of the War Office, does it not?—I do not think the War Office have any allotments.

1586. But do you put any kind of pressure upon the seamen?—None whatever. They make a declaration before their commanding officer that they wish to allot to their families, and this declaration, when it is checked by the paymaster, who has to see that it is within the limit that the man is allowed to allot, is sent to the Admiralty. The Admiralty on that authority pay over the allotment to the person nominated to receive it.

Chairman—continued.

1587. And then do you render from time to time to the seamen a statement of accounts?—No, the seaman knows that once he makes this declaration his family will receive the amount inserted in it.

1588. And he receives the balance of the money due to him at the particular station where he is serving?—That is paid to him by the paymaster. He has also power to stop the allotment whenever he likes.

1589. Is the practice to which you have referred one of large application?—Very large application.

1590. And naturally it is favoured by the Lords of the Admiralty?—Very much.

1591. Does it involve a large amount of clerical clerical work?—Yes, in my department there is a very large branch which entirely deals with allotments. Up to a year ago allotments were also paid in great measure by our cashiers at the dockyards, but since then they have been paid through the Post Office.

Chairman—continued.

1592. The change in the method of payment has given general satisfaction, has it not?—I think so.

1593. Now does that payment in the ordinary course of things abruptly cease upon intimation of the death of the seaman?—Yes.

1594. In certain cases it has been continued after the death was notorious?—Yes, especially in the case of the "Serpent," and in the case of the "Victoria."

1595. How is that continuance determined and authorised?—The Lords of the Admiralty considered it necessary to come to the support of these people, and approved that the allotment should be continued.

1596. In the case of the "Victoria" disaster, was there any intermission, and, if so, what, in the payment of the amounts allotted to the families who had become widows and orphans by that disaster?—None whatever; they were paid to the 1st of July, and in some cases to the 1st of August; and in two cases till the 1st of September, where there was some delay in getting the necessary documents for obtaining their pensions.

1597. Then, as a matter of fact, from the pecuniary point of view, are you able to say that no family is worse off from the loss of their husband and father?—In the case of those that allotted. We were, of course, unable to give any immediate relief to those who had not received allotments.

1598. About what proportion could you say of those men who were lost in the "Victoria" had provided for their families?—There were 361 persons of all ranks lost; of course that includes officers and others; but the numbers of those lost who had made allotments were 97 men and 14 boys; that is to say, 111 altogether. There were 108 saved of those who allotted, and whose allotments were continued as a matter of course.

1599. Those were not all men with families?—There were dependent relatives.

1600. Perhaps it would not be desirable that I should press you in regard to Greenwich Hospital?—No, Mr. Lambert is here. He is the Director.

1601. But are you able to say how quickly the benefits from the Greenwich Hospital Funds are distributed?—I should prefer to leave that to Mr. Lambert to say; it does not come under me at all.

Mr. Kearley.

1602. Naturally these families, these widows, have to incur some additional expense by reason of the husband dying; in mourning, and such things as that; they have to expend money to provide mourning for the family?—Yes.

1603. Therefore they would not be on the same terms as they would be were the husband living; or rather, to put it in another way, the allotment would not serve the purpose as it would have done had not the husband died?—I should think there would probably be a small sum over and above what was necessary for their support, to provide them with mourning.

1604. The continuance of the allotment to July, and in some cases even to September, did not represent that the amount of money at the disposal of these families could be expended in the same direction as it had been expended before this disaster occurred; there would be a call upon the families to provide mourning?—Of course there would be a small outlay for mourning.

Chairman.

1605. By the by, the Admiralty give gratuities to certain persons, other than widows and children, who are dependent?—Yes. We gave gratuities to 145 dependent relatives of those who were lost, the aggregate amount of which was 3,303*l.* 12*s.* 4*d.* in the case of the "Victoria."

Commander Bethell.

1606. Has there not been a practice of giving something like a year's pay to the widows in cases of these disasters?—Not to widows; dependent relatives. The balance of any pay that may be due to their husbands is handed over to the next-of-kin; but to the widows we give pensions.

1607. I know of the widows' pensions, but is not a sum of the year's pay given; a year's pay is the amount of pay that is usually given?—Yes.

1608. And, as I understand it, usually to dependents, is it?—Yes, dependents.

1609. But in the case of the "Victoria," did these relief sums that you mentioned amount to a year's pay?—Yes, they were based upon a year's pay.

1610. Can you tell me, is it a regular rule at the Admiralty, when life is lost, that the dependents get a year's pay of the person who provided for them; the dependents, other than the widow, I mean?—It is only in exceptional cases that the Admiralty give gratuities.

1611. I do not quite remember; are the Admiralty in the habit when a man loses his life of giving any assistance to the widow where there is no widow's pension to which she is entitled, or to the dependents?—I do not think so. I do not remember any amount being given to a widow in such a case.

1612. But I think there are cases where there is no widow's pension to which she is entitled; it requires a certain amount of service to entitle a woman to a widow's pension. In those cases where the husband dies and the widow is entitled to no pension, does she get relief, as a matter of fact?—It is done from Greenwich Hospital.

1614. With regard to those figures that you gave, 111 and 108, that is a small number of men men to be allotting money, is it not?—Yes, it is.

1615. Unusually small?—Unusually small; because the men were young men who had no wives, and probably their families were not dependent upon them. There were only 22 widows out of the whole number of men lost.

1616. I recollect some years ago being astonished at the number of quite young men who allotted money to their parents?—Yes, and so they do; to their fathers and mothers, and brothers and sisters.

Mr. Kearley.

1617. May I ask you as to this small percentage of men who allotted, might it have been occasioned by the fact that the allotments at that time were paid through the dockyards?—I do not think that had any effect.

1618. Are a larger number allotting now?—Yes, it is increasing, but I think not specially owing to that cause; but the loss of the "Serpent" and the loss of the "Victoria" have given a great impetus to the allotment system.

Mr. Cochrane.

1619. May I ask if there are many sailors who do not actually allot who send home Post Office orders themselves?—Yes, there are.

1620. And those cases would have been perhaps more hardly treated than regular allotments?—That is the position: the Admiralty are always willing to treat the cases of those who allot, because they know from their own records those who send allotments through the Post Office. We are more conversant with their circumstances, and therefore can come to their support at the particular moment.

1621. And though the Admiralty would be quite willing to assist them, from want of knowledge they fail to assist some cases which are possibly very deserving?—That is so.

Mr. GEORGE THOMAS LAMBERT, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

1622. You are Director of Greenwich Hospital?—Yes.

1623. Is there any other office that you hold?—No.

1624. As Director of Greenwich Hospital, will you please give the Committee as concisely as you can something of the story of that great charity. It was founded by Royal Charter, was it not, in 1694?—It was so.

1625. Will you tell the Committee what was the object?—The origin of it was the number of disabled men after the Battle of La Hogue; Queen Mary felt great compassion for them, and she proposed to the King that the Palace at Greenwich, which Charles II. had commenced, and which had been left unfinished, should be devoted to a hospital for them. This idea was taken up, there was a Royal Charter in 1694, devoting the palace to that purpose; and that was followed by an Act of Parliament in 1696, which gave 6*d.* a month from the wages of all seamen, whether of the Royal Navy or the Merchant Service, for the support of the hospital.

1626. Will you recite the terms of the directions of the Act of Parliament?—The Royal Charter gives the best indication. The object was "the relief and support of seamen serving on board the ships or vessels belonging to the Royal Navy of us our heirs or successors, or employed in our or their service at sea, who, by reason of age, wounds, or other disabilities shall be incapable of further service at sea, and be unable to maintain themselves; and for the sustentation of the widows, and the maintenance and education of the children of seamen happening to be slain or disabled in such sea service; and also for the further relief and encouragement of seamen, and improvement of navigation." Then comes the Act of Parliament of 1696.

1626*. But substantially the Act of Parliament gave effect to the terms of the Royal Charter?—Yes.

Chairman—continued.

1627. And then, I think, you told us that provision was made by a deduction of 6*d.* a month from the wages of seamen?—Of all seamen.

1628. That amount was further augmented in 1708, was it not?—Yes, by the grant of all forfeited and unclaimed prize moneys.

1629. And it was again augmented by a certain percentage on all prize and bounty monies, was it not?—That percentage followed in 1806.

1630. Those payments were continued until when?—Until the year 1829.

1631. There were large forfeited estates, were there not, that were made over to the hospital?—Lord Derwentwater's estates in Westmorland, Cumberland, and Northumberland were made over to Greenwich Hospital in 1735. They were forfeited in the Rebellion of 1715, but in 1735 they were made over by an Act of Parliament to Greenwich Hospital.

1632. Has there been any other augmentation of the income?—There have been many donations and Parliamentary grants from time to time.

1633. Then, beginning as you have told us in 1694, what form did the expenditure for the benefits take?—The establishment of an asylum, called the Royal Hospital for Seamen, at Greenwich, and in 1704, the first men entered the asylum, 100 in number. The buildings had then progressed so far as to admit of 100 men coming in. The buildings were gradually completed by Sir Christopher Wren, until they were capable of taking in 2,700 men; and that number was actually in the buildings in 1814.

1634. Up to that time the benefits were enjoyed by the seamen only?—By the seamen almost entirely.

1635. Widows and orphans did not participate?—There had been a school for boys, which had grown from the year 1712 from very small beginnings, and had gradually increased, and which is now the Royal Hospital School at Greenwich.

1636. That was, in fact, upon the hospital estate?—It was part of the foundation. The education of children was one of the objects of the foundation.

1637. What kind of benefit did the wives of these veterans receive?—Very little was done for the wives; in fact, nothing at all was done for the wives until shortly before the hospital was closed in 1865. Then some allowances were given to the wives of the pensioners who were in the hospital, and who were in a state of great distress. The widows had some provision made for them in the hospital itself as nurses; there were about 140 of them

1638. That is to say, they received benefit by being enabled to earn?—By being employed in the hospital.

1639. In what year did the system of out-pensions begin?—The out-pensions first commenced in 1763; at that time the surplus income of the hospital was devoted to out-pensions of 7*l.* a year.

1640. Were those pensions to men only?—To men only.

1641. Did the men receive those pensions as a matter of right to which they were entitled, or was there discrimination in regard to that?—They were given to such men as had become "worn out and decrepit in the service of their country"; those are the words of the Act of Parliament.

1642. That would mean character and general merit?—Taking into account their service, and their distress and their condition generally.

1643. Did Parliament make grants-in-aid of those out-pensions?—Yes.

1644. To about what amount?—I am afraid I am unable to give that figure. The allowances from Parliament were uncertain; they were given for a series of years; then they appear to have been omitted, and given again.

1645. They were irregular and intermittent?—Yes.

1646. In 1806 a scale of out-pensions of a more general character was adopted, was it not?—That was so.

1647. What amount did those go to?—They went up to 18*l.* a year as the maximum.

1648. Retaining the 7*l.* as the minimum?—As the minimum.

1649. Then a little later, namely, in 1812 a system of gratuities was established, was it not?—Yes.

1650. What was the nature of those gratuities?—As far as I can tell they would be about a year's pension. If the man had been pensioned he would have it continuously; the Admiralty gave him as a gratuity one year only of the pension.

1651. Up to about that time there was a fund known as the "Chest at Greenwich" which had been the "Chest at Chatham"?—Yes.

1652. What was the nature of that fund?—The fund was established just after the fight with the Armada; there were many wounded men; they petitioned the Queen for some assistance, and she referred the petition to the Lord

Chairman—continued.

High Admiral. It was arranged, with consent of the seamen, that 6*d.* a month should be deducted from their wages. These contributions were paid into a fund originally at Chatham called the "Chest at Chatham"; the chest that is frequently alluded to by Pepys in his "Diary." At the beginning of this century it was removed to Greenwich, and in 1814 it was amalgamated with the funds of Greenwich Hospital. That was entirely for the benefit of men wounded in fight with the enemy.

1653. The accumulation was considerable, was it not, at that time?—The estates were sold, and the total sum handed over was 1,355,400*l.* in consols.

1654. Since 1829, the systems of out-pensions has become more dependent upon Parliament, has it not?—In 1829, the Treasury or Consolidated Fund took over the out-pensions altogether, and Greenwich Hospital was deprived of certain sources of income, viz., 6*d.* a month from the wages of men of the Royal Navy, the percentage upon prize money and the forfeited prize moneys. The 6*d.* a month from the wages of merchant seamen was abolished in 1834.

1655. Do I understand that the Treasury took possession of those funds and left them dependent upon Parliament for the necessary amount?—The 6*d.* a month from the wages of seamen ceased to be payable; and the prize money now goes to the Treasury.

1656. You told us that, in 1834, the payment of 6*d.* a month from the wages of merchant seamen was abolished; and you received in lieu of it a grant of 20,000*l.* a year from the Consolidated Fund, did you not?—That is so.

1657. Now we come on to the later days when Greenwich Hospital was closed as an asylum; that was between the years 1865 and 1869, was it not?—It was so.

1658. And with these funds liberated from the hospital, a system of old age and special pensions was inaugurated?—That was so.

1659. What is the amount of the age pension?—The age pension is 5*d.* a day to a man who has a naval pension for life, and who is over 55 years of age. At the age of 65 he gets an additional 4*d.*

1660. That is to say, that from 55 years of age, in addition to his naval pension, he receives 5*d.* a day?—Yes.

1661. And if he lives to the age of 65, that 5*d.* becomes 9*d.*?—Yes.

1662. Still, in addition to his naval pension?—That is so.

1663. And you include for that purpose in the Greenwich Hospital estimate a sum of what?—£. 100,000.

1664. Are there special pensions to meet exceptional cases beyond those you refer to?—There is provision made in the estimate for a sum of 22,000*l.* for special pensions, which are to meet cases of men whose health has broken down, and who, perhaps, have been obliged to leave the service prematurely, or who have very small naval pensions.

1665. Is there accommodation in the naval hospitals also for men of that kind?—In the naval hospitals at Yarmouth, Chatham, Portsmouth, mouth, Devonport, and Haulbowline, there is accommodation provided for a limited number of men disabled, and entitled to the benefits of Greenwich Hospital; Greenwich Hospital pays for those men 2*s.* 6*d.* a day, and receives their naval pensions.

1666. In determining those pensions, so far as you have referred to them, what consideration is shown for the wife and the number of children who might be dependent upon her?—The number of age pensions is not sufficient to give a pension to every naval pensioner over 55 years of age; a selection has to be made, and that is made by the Admiralty on consideration of all the circumstances of the case, the man's state of health, whether he can earn anything to add to his naval pension, and so forth.

1667. But pensions are given from the fund to widows under certain circumstances?—When a man's death is attributable to the service, or he has died from extraordinary exposure on duty, then a pension is given to the widow and an allowance to the children.

1668. Is that graduated according to the rank?—According to the rank.

1669. And it varies from 3*s.* 6*d.* to 6*s.* 6*d.* a week for the widow, does it not?—That is so.

1670. And from 1*s.* 6*d.* to 2*s.* a week for each child dependent on the mother?—Yes.

1671. Now there is a great school, of which we have heard a good deal, at Greenwich Hospital also, is there not?—There is.

1672. How many boys receive education and maintenance there?—There are 1,000 boys, the sons of seamen and marines, who are maintained and educated, and there are 100 day boys who are paid for by the trustees of Sir William Boreman's Foundation; but as far as the Navy is concerned there are about 1,000.

1673. Do these 1,000 receive maintenance as well as education?—Yes, everything.

1674. But there are certain orphan boys and girls also maintained out of a fund in other homes?—There are 100 orphan boys who are too young to go to Greenwich, or unfit, and who are maintained in various orphanages and homes, and about 200 girls are maintained in homes and in schools.

1675. Then beyond those advantages conferred by the fund, is anything done for retired officers of the Royal Navy and their children?—There are a number of pensions for retired officers, about 140, and there are allowances of 20*l.* a year each given to 75 children of deceased or distressed naval officers.

1676. And am I right in supposing that the sum of 9,235*l.* is annually appropriated for that object?—Yes, including the salary of the Visitor and Governor of Greenwich Hospital, which absorbs 400*l.* a year at present.

1677. What kind of relief is given for dependent relatives of men whose death is attributable to the service?—They may receive gratuities not exceeding one year's pay of the deceased man; but the total sum spent in the course of the year is not to exceed 500*l.*; that is by Act of Parliament.

Chairman—continued.

1678. You have presented a statement of the estimated income and expenditure of the hospital for the last year; would you tell the Committee something about the Travers Foundation, referred to in that statement?—The Travers Foundation came into existence in 1728. It was founded then by the will of Mr. Travers, who stated therein that he had been considering for a long time how to devote his money to the best possible object. He therefore devoted an estate in Essex, and other property, to the support of a limited number of superannuated or disabled lieutenants of the Royal Navy. His will fell into Chancery, and the foundation did not actually take effect till 1798, when the funds had accumulated to some extent. A piece of ground in the town of Windsor, close to the Castle, was then purchased, and a terrace of houses was erected in which these retired officers were to reside. They were a corporation entirely self-governed, but the Admiralty selected for admission to that charity. The charity became somewhat out of date, and complaints were made of the way in which the institution was conducted. The Admiralty caused inquiry to be made, with the result that an Act of Parliament was obtained to abolish the institution, to hand over the estates to Greenwich Hospital, and to devote the proceeds to pensions for the same class of persons as were received in the houses at Windsor before. That has been done.

Commander Bethell.

1679. What year was that?—That was 1892.

Chairman.

1680. In 1892 a Select Committee was appointed by the House of Commons "to inquire into the causes which have led to the limitation in the number of seamen receiving age pensions out of Greenwich Hospital funds, and to consider whether any steps can properly be taken to make provision for a larger number of age pensioners, and to inquire into their alleged grievances." That Committee presented its report in April 1892, and therefore it will not be necessary for me to take you into as much fulness of detail as might otherwise be necessary in regard to the general administration of the hospital. But in respect to the pensions to widows and the allowances to children, which I suppose in all cases must arise out of deaths attributable to the service?—That is so.

1681. And which, as you have stated, are graduated according to the rank of the deceased?—That is so.

1682. How long a time does it take by the process which you follow to bring those benefits into actual operation?—It takes in an ordinary case a month almost exactly from the date at which we hear of the case until the money is paid to the widow.

Chairman—continued.

1683. Can you tell us shortly what is the process followed; do you wait for an application?—Applications come in one of two ways: sometimes through the Medical Director-General of the Navy; he has a return of accidents that have happened, and he reports them to us, and that they were attributable to the service. But applications are also received direct from the widows themselves. When they come from the widows themselves the cases are referred to the Medical Director-General to report what were the circumstances, and if the circumstances are such that the man's death was clearly attributable to the service we then call for certain information; we send a form to the widow to fill up, inquiring, for instance, how many children she has got, and calling for certificates of birth of herself and her children; we also institute inquiries confidentially as to her character, and obtain from the Accountant General the rating of the man in the service with a view to determine the scale of pension. All that is done with as little delay as possible. Then the case is submitted to the Board of Admiralty for their decision as to whether the pension is to be granted.

1684. In determining the title of the applicants, do you take into consideration their income from other sources, their circumstances in life?—We ask them questions on that point. I only recollect one case in which a pension has been withheld, and then it was found that the widow was receiving from a public source a considerable income. We gave the allowance to the children, but suspended it in the case of the widow herself, till she should happen to be no longer in receipt of that income.

1685. Can you tell us what number of pensions are authorised?—At the present moment there are 297 pensions to widows in force, and allowances to 437 children. Many of the children go to schools at the expense of Greenwich Hospital, and then the allowances drop.

1686. The pensions to officers and allowances to their children in the year 1894–95 amounted to 9,235*l.*, did they not?—Yes.

1687. While there was expended upon seamen and marines and their widows and children the large sum of 170,589*l.*?—That is so.

1688. In the table before me, given in the Paper which has been handed to me, you show the percentage of income awarded to officers and children as 4¾ per cent., while to seamen and marines it amounted to what?—To 89½ per cent.

1689. One and a quarter per cent. is expended on the maintenance of Greenwich Hospital?—Yes, on the gallery of pictures, maintenance of chapel, cemeteries, and pensions to the former staff of the Hospital.

1690. Two per cent. represents the outlay on estates in the North of England and at Greenwich; 2 per cent. is the cost of administration at the Admiralty; leaving you a surplus income of one-half per cent.?—That is so.

1691. I was asking you as to the time which it took to bring into benefit those who had established their claim upon your funds, and I think you said that, generally speaking, it was accomplished within a month?—When the case is quite straight that is so. There are cases happening on foreign stations where it may be necessary to refer again to the captain of the ship for further particulars; that causes delay.

1692. But supposing the ship to be lost, as in the case of the "Victoria," what happens?—In the case of the "Victoria" there was unusual delay because it so happened that the crew had been changed from ship to ship, and the Accountant General, who keeps the records of the crews, was unable to give me at once for certain the names of the men who were in the "Victoria"; there was therefore an unusual delay; but we did what was possible, and the result was that out of the 73 cases of widows in England we had pensioned 57 by the 15th of August (the loss of the ship took place on the 23rd of June), and by the end of August we had pensioned 67 out of the 73. There were some more widows at Malta, who, through ignorance, and one cause and another, did not make themselves known to us till later; there were 10 such cases.

1693. Then the last widow's case whose claim came before you was dealt with in what time?—At the beginning of 1894.

1694. Is there anything further you would like to say?—I should supplement that by saying that in the case of the loss of the "Serpent," which had only just left port, we knew for certain what the crew consisted of. The ship was lost on the 10th of November, and by the 10th of December we had pensioned all the widows, 61, with the exception of three.

1695. We have been speaking of the seamen; do the Marines come within the same category?—Yes.

1696. Is there anything further you would like to say?—No.

1697. I referred just now to the Report of the Select Committee appointed in 1892; can you say what has been done in furtherance of the recommendations of that Committee?—The Committee recommended that the Navy should pay a rent of 5,000 l. a year for the use of the old hospital buildings at Greenwich. They are now used as a naval college. Up to that date they had paid a rent of but 100*l.* a year. That recommendation has been carried out. The Committee further recommended that a sum of 16,000*l.* a year formerly paid to Greenwich Hospital should be restored. That has been done; that is all that has been done.

Mr. Kearley.

1698. Was there any other recommendation?—Officers' pensions they referred to, but they did not make any distinct recommendation.

1699. It was a matter of opinion, was it not. I know that the Admiralty has not taken it over; over; that the Parliamentary Secretary of the Admiralty has not taken up the recommendation. Is it not a matter that is open to a difference of opinion?—Shall I read the words of the Report of the Committee? "The Committee are not, therefore, in favour of transferring the existing officers' Greenwich pensions, established in consequence of the Act of 1865, to naval funds; but they think that there are some grounds for so transferring the additional sum of 3,200*l.* assigned for the same object since 1865."

Mr. Kearley—continued.

Mr. Kearley—continued.

1700. I was addressing my remarks for the moment to the 3,200*l.*?—Yes.

Chairman.

1701. "There are some grounds for so transferring"; have the Admiralty acknowledged those grounds?—They have not.

1702. And the other recommendations, such as they are, are dormant?—There are no other recommendations.

WILLIAM WOODALL, Esq., IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. GEORGE T. LAMBERT, re-called; and further Examined.

Commander Bethell.

1703. You have given us the history of the Greenwich Hospital Fund, and I should like to know if a widow of a naval person, whose husband dies in the ordinary course without any special relations of hardship to the service owing to accident, can you give her a pension?—No, nothing whatever.

1704. You are entirely confined to those cases where the husband has died either in the execution of his duty or through some cause immediately traceable to the exigencies of the service?—That is so; we can assist the children by sending them to a school.

1705. But I confine myself to widows; you cannot do anything for widows?—Nothing whatever.

1706. What can you do for children?—There is Greenwich Hospital School to which boys can be sent, and also there are orphanages and schools throughout the country to which we send boys and girls. They are sent at the expense of Greenwich Hospital.

1707. You referred to those the other day; I do not think you told us how many of those orphanages and schools there were?—The exact number I cannot tell you; the number of children I can tell you.

1708. But these orphanages and schools are not orphanages and schools especially for these children?—No.

1709. But the children are sent to other places?—To other places selected by the Admiralty.

1710. And what number of children have you?—There are about 200 girls and about 100 boys sent to these institutions.

1711. Did you tell us the amount of money that was assigned for the children?—For boys and girls together it is about 6,000*l.* a year.

1712. The Greenwich Hospital pensions, I think you told us, were in some cases in addition to the pensions that men may get from the Navy?—No man is eligible for a Greenwich Hospital age pension unless he has a naval pension for life as well. There are special pensions from Greenwich Hospital, which are given without the necessity of having a naval pension also, to men who are disabled.

1713. But the ordinary Greenwich Hospital age pension is especially for those men who have got pensions from the service?—That is a necessary condition; they are supplementary, they are additional in fact.

1714. Must a man have arrived at a particular age before he is eligible for these pensions?—A man must be 55 years of age before he can get an age pension.

1715. No option is left in that matter?—No, that is fixed by an Order in Council.

1716. Is that varied from time to time?—The Order in Council has never been varied so far as the minimum age goes. There is a further pension of 4*d.* a day at the age of 65, and that formerly was at the age of 70.

1717. I have not had my attention called to the accounts, as I see them here; will you be good enough to say is the whole of your income spent?—In that particular year 1894–95 we estimated that the whole income would be expended, except about 800*l.* The accounts for the year are not yet completed, but the Estimates for that year showed that the surplus would be about 800*l.*

1718. Speaking roughly, are you by way of spending the whole of your income?—We do. As a matter of fact, it is not desirable that we should do so, because there is a very heavy liability in future hanging over Greenwich Hospital for these widows and orphans. The actuary tells us that it will amount to 18,000*l.* or 20,000*l.* a year eventually, and at present it is only 5,500*l.*

1719. When you have got a liability of that nature hanging over you, that is part of your revenue surely?—It will fall upon the revenue.

1720. I mean you consider that in the objects of your revenue?—Yes; unless we accumulate, it looks as if our revenue would be insufficient in the future to meet that liability.

1721. On the other hand, on one side of your account it would be shown?—Certainly.

1722. Then,

1722. Then, I think, you told us that some of the estates that were made over to you had been sold?—The larger part of them has been sold.

1723. And the money invested?—And the money invested.

1724. Who is responsible for the investment of the money?—Their Lordships of the Admiralty are responsible for the investment of the money.

1725. What is the operation?—A proposal comes for the mortgage of an estate, for example; it comes to me; I refer it to the solicitor for his opinion; if it looks as if it were a satisfactory investment it goes before their Lordships of the Admiralty with a proposal that it should be investigated. If they sanction that, a surveyor and valuer is employed to survey the estate and go over it minutely and report as to its character and as to its value.

1726. The persons who are responsible for the investment are the Lords of the Admiralty?—Yes.

1727. Do you think that there is much overlapping, or any overlapping, between the distribution of the Greenwich Hospital Fund and the funds in the hands of the Patriotic Fund Commissioners, and of the other funds of which we have heard something?—I can hardly answer that question satisfactorily, because I know nothing of the other funds. I know something of the Patriotic Fund, because in the case of the "Victoria" Fund, I was in communication with the secretary, and it was arranged that the Patriotic Fund Commissioners should be kept informed of everything that was done by Greenwich Hospital for these widows and children. That was carried out.

1728. With regard to the Naval Fund of the Exhibition, there is no system of communication, is there, between you and the authorities there?—Yes, I am a member myself of the Royal Naval Exhibition Fund Committee, and we have perfect communication.

1729. Better communication than you have with the Patriotic Fund?—Certainly.

1730. Is it your opinion from what you know of these two funds besides your own that there is overlapping?—There may be overlapping in the case of the Patriotic Fund, not in the case of the Royal Naval Exhibition Fund.

1731. How long have you been director?—Ten years.

1732. After your experience, is it your opinion that it would be better if these funds, naval funds, were lumped together and managed for one body?—My opinion is that it would not be desirable that the Admiralty should undertake the whole management of the funds subscribed by the public. I think that there are one or two objections to that. First of all, the Admiralty would find it difficult to appeal to the public, and I doubt if the public would respond so readily to the Admiralty as to the lord mayor or some independent authority. And the men themselves of the Navy, I think, would not like it, because there would be an impression that the Admiralty would use these funds subscribed in order to relieve the Navy Votes or the funds of Greenwich Hospital.

1733. I did not point to that solution that the Admiralty should have all the funds?—I am quite of opinion that naval funds other than those of Greenwich Hospital might be brought together with great advantage and managed by one body, that body to be in communication with the Admiralty.

1734. There is, after all, no very substantial difference between the Greenwich Hospital Fund and the other funds. It is true that the Greenwich Hospital Fund has been given by the State over a considerable number of years; but having once been given the distribution is assigned more or less?—I think so.

1735. And it does not seem to make any very material difference whether the money has been collected from individuals or handed over by the State at different times?—No, I do not think it does.

1736. Do you think that there would be any particular objection if the funds were lumped together and administered by some outside body other than the Admiralty; do you think that it would be better in the interests of the seamen I mean?—In some ways it would, but in other ways it would not; for instance, the Admiralty in giving away their naval pensions to men ought to be in very close connection with the body which administers the Greenwich Hospital pensions. They are to some extent dependent on each other. No man, for instance, is eligible for a Greenwich Hospital age pension who has not got a naval pension. Then the special pensions of Greenwich Hospital are given away in consideration of the man's service in the Navy, the nature of that service, the character and history of the man, which is recorded in the books of the Admiralty. And that is also true to some extent of the age pensions. Therefore, the Greenwich Hospital funds and the Admiralty funds, naval funds proper, are very intimately connected.

1737. The difficulty in my mind that I cannot very well get rid of, after all the evidence we have had, is that we have really two distinct subjects: we have the question of giving relief in times of pressure, in times of disaster and war, and so on; and we have the other case of old age pensions. Those are two distinct subjects, and they appear both in the Greenwich Hospital funds to some extent, and in the other funds of which we have heard to be not very clearly distinguished from one another?—Greenwich Hospital deals with both classes.

1738. I know it does. Do not you think that all these funds with these two objects might be kept more clearly apart in the administration of the funds?—For instance, take the Royal Naval Exhibition Fund; the income of that fund is devoted to the widows and children of men who die in the ordinary way in the service; not men who are killed. The widows of men who are killed are assisted by Greenwich Hospital; the widows of men who die in the ordinary way are not so assisted; so the Royal Naval Exhibition Fund takes them under its care. On the other hand, the "Victoria" Fund and the "Serpent" Fund and the others were subscribed for the families of men who lost their lives in disasters. So that these various small funds are not all applied to the same class of objects.

1739. What measure do the Admiralty take to

to make the Greenwich Hospital Fund known to the seamen?—It is made known through the regulations published in the Navy Lists, which are in every ship in the service, and all the Coast Guard Stations have notices giving details of all that is done for the men and their wives and children.

1740. You issue an annual report, do you not?—No, that report is only for the Admiralty. The estimate goes before the House of Commons, and is published.

1741. We do not get the accounts, do we?—The accounts are published and presented to Parliament.

Lord Edmund Talbot.

1742. With regard to these children who are sent to these orphanages, are they classified according to religious persuasion?—For the Catholic children we have certain schools selected in England and Ireland.

1743. On the same system as in the case of the Patriotic Fund?—Probably so. The other children go to homes selected by the Admiralty, principally at Portsmouth and Plymouth.

1744. And that works satisfactorily?—Yes.

Mr. Kearley.

1745. There are many cases, I suppose, where men die in the service of the Crown, and their widows and children are unrelieved by public generosity?—Yes.

1746. In fact, am I correct in assuming that those who are relieved in this manner are the widows and children of those who lose their lives in some, I might say, sensational disaster?—Whose deaths are attributable to the service in some form.

1747. But I am referring now to public subscriptions that are collected. They are only collected on the occasion of a ship going down, such as the "Victoria"?—That is so.

1748. Are there cases of men in the Navy losing their lives when very little publicity attaches to the disaster, and consequently they are dependent on Greenwich Funds only?—That is so.

1749. Have you any figures to show the number of these men that lose their lives in these ways which are not so public as the "Victoria" and the "Serpent"?—I know the number of widows and children left. I cannot give you the figures of the number of men, because I have not here any record of the men who left no widows or children.

1750. But you have a separate list of widows and children dependent on Greenwich who are not receiving any assistance from public funds?—As far as I know, that is so.

1751. Could you give us those figures?—I cannot give you them at this moment. The "Victoria" and some of the others are receiving assistance from other funds than those of Greenwich Hospital. To take out those not so receiving assistance, I should have to make inquiry.

1752. We may take it that there are a large number of such cases still?—Yes.

1753. I remember, for instance, the "Wasp" was lost?—There were two "Wasps."

Mr. Kearley—continued.

1754. And both of them were lost. Was there any public subscription made for the dependent relatives?—I think in both cases; but I am not certain.

1755. Under one of the clauses of the Patriotic Fund Act the children of those that are lost have a claim on the Patriotic Fund. Do you know whether the Admiralty ever applied to the Patriotic Fund to get the children of these men lost in the service of the Crown relieved?—I do not recollect a case in which this has been done.

1756. You make no application yourself?—No.

1757. Under the Patriotic Act of 1867, there is a provision which I will read; it is in Clause 5: "Thirdly, in maintenance education training and advancement of children of other soldiers seamen and marines of Her Majesty's Army and Navy who have lost or hereafter lose their lives in the service of the Crown or by or in consequence of casualties sustained or disease contracted in the service of the Crown." Now, there must be many cases within the knowledge of the Admiralty where children would be eligible under that provision?—I think so.

1758. And the Admiralty does not make a practice of submitting the names to the Patriotic Fund Commissioners?—I have only known that done in the case of the "Victoria;" it was then that the Patriotic Commissioners applied to the Admiralty and suggested that they should have information as to the lists of widows and children and what was done for them by Greenwich Hospital; and they were kept informed from day to day.

1759. I may take it that the Admiralty has no cognisance that there are large sums of money in the hands of the Patriotic Fund Commissioners available for this particular purpose?—They do not take any official notice of it.

1760. Now, as regards these Greenwich pensions that you pay, that is a part of the contract that you make with the men when they join the service, is it not?—The men are told that they have an expectation of getting these pensions, but that the Admiralty reserve entire discretion as to the awarding of them or not.

1761. That applies to all pensions; all pensions are supposed not to be given as matter of right?—The Admiralty make it more emphatic in the case of Greenwich Hospital because, being charitable funds, they like to judge of all the circumstances of the case, and keep the case, as it were, in their own hands.

1762. But you rarely disqualify anyone, properly entitled, from receiving these benefits?—In the case of any man properly entitled, so long as the numbers are not full, we give him an age pension.

1763. I was not referring so much to the age pensions as to the pensions that come to the widows and children?—Every widow that comes within the qualifications gets her pension.

1764. And that is a part of the contract you make with the men on joining; you advertise it on your advertisements?—I hardly like to use the word "contract," because the Admiralty are very very particular in reserving their discretion as to the award of the pensions; but they are given in every case; they always have been so given.

1765. Now, I understood you last week to say that under ordinary circumstances you administer these Greenwich funds in the case of disaster, on an average, within a month from the time of the disaster?—Yes.

1766. And you consider that the "Victoria" was rather a difficult case to deal with?—It was more difficult than usual.

1767. But you begin to administer it at once where you have sufficient information, I understand?—Yes.

1768. There was in that case no delay; or rather, the whole of the beneficiaries had not to wait for their benefit for two months. You mentioned that it took you two months to get the fund going?—The ship was lost on the 22nd of June, and by the 15th of August following we had paid 57 widows out of the total of 73 at that date known to us; then 10 more were paid by the 31st of August, making 67 out of 73.

1769. You began to administer even sooner than that in some cases?—Yes, by the 31st of July 12 cases had been disposed of.

1770. Within a month or six weeks you began to administer these funds?—Certainly.

1771. Now, did you supply the Patriotic Fund Commission with the information that you had at your disposal without any application on their part, or did they apply to you for the information?—I think the first letter came from them.

1772. Can you tell us when that application was made?—I have not got the date here.

1773. Would it be within a month?—I should think a month.

1774. At all events, you could have supplied the Patriotic Fund Commissioners with information as quickly as you received it yourselves?—Certainly.

1775. I find that the Patriotic Fund Commissioners did write to you on the 29th of June, within a week practically of the vessel going down, asking to be furnished with the names and addresses of the widows and orphans and dependent relatives of those who lost their lives in H.M.S. "Victoria;" and on the 7th of August you supplied them with information. So that the Patriotic Fund Commissioners had ample material by the 7th of August. Now, do you ever make a beneficiary wait for the sum of money to which she may be entitled for a year or two years; do you defer a payment?—Never. I may qualify that by saying that there was one case of a widow who, after her pension had been awarded, obtained an appointment of a public character with a considerable salary; and the Admiralty decided in that case to suspend the further payment of pension so long as she held that public appointment. That is the only case of any kind.

1776. You referred to that last time?—Yes.

1777. Can you give us any idea what the salary of that appointment was?—The appointment was at a salary of 100*l.* a year. There have been several cases under consideration where women have been employed in the dockyard, and so on, but we have never withheld the pension from them. It was only where the salary was so considerable as 100*l.* a year that we suspended the pension so long as the appointment was held.

1778. You have always decided not to interfere with the pension except where the salary was very large?—Yes; and in that case we continued to pay for the three children.

1779. In spite of the fact that the woman was receiving 100*l.* a year, you continued to pay the pension for the children?—Certainly.

1780. And in a case where women are taken to the ropery and the colour shop you continue to pay the pension, notwithstanding that they are receiving 12*s.* to 14*s.* a week?—Certainly.

1781. You never defer a pension because a woman happens to have 50*l.* in hand?—Never.

1782. Now, with regard to the morals of those who receive pensions; I presume you make some sort of inquiry into the conduct of the women entitled to receive a pension?—No pension is given without some inquiry as to the character of the woman. Those inquiries are made in a confidential manner, and I am glad to be able to say that, of the very numerous cases which have been investigated on behalf of Greenwich Hospital, it is only in the very rarest instances that we have found that the women have been unworthy of assistance. They have been in nearly every case highly respectable.

Commander Bethell.

1783. Is there a thorough inquiry?—Thorough inquiry; through the police generally.

Mr. Kearley.

1784. Do you continue to prosecute these inquiries from time to time, or having once satisfied yourselves that the woman is respectable, do you continue to give the pension without further inquiry?—Without further inquiry unless some information affecting her character is volunteered by some party, in which case we are bound to look into it.

1785. But you do not keep up a system of espionage?—Certainly not.

1786. Is the Greenwich pension to widows continuable on re-marriage?—No, it is suspended on re-marriage. If the woman should again become a widow she resumes her pension.

1787. That is a fixed condition, is it?—A fixed rule.

1788. Would these children continue to receive a pension notwithstanding the fact that the mother had been re-married again?—Yes, they would.

1789. No forfeiture takes place on that occasion?—None at all.

1790. Then, in addition to these pensions you make, I think, what you call compassionate allowances?—Not to the widows.

1791. What do you estimate the expenses of the management of the Greenwich Fund to be?—Two per cent. of the income.

1792. Do you think that you could administer additional funds on the same ratio of expense?—I think additional funds, assuming they are small funds, would probably cost rather more, perhaps

 2½ per

Mr. Kearley—continued.

2½ per cent., because we should have to keep separate books and accounts all separate, and so on; but I should imagine that 2½ per cent. would cover any charge.

1793. You think that would fully cover it?—I should think so.

1794. Now, you seemed to have some hesitation about accepting the idea that the Admiralty would be an advantageous body to administer these various naval funds, some in the hands of the Patriotic Fund Commissioners, and one in the hands of the Naval Exhibition Fund; but is not your objection mainly, because you fear that in future disasters the Admiralty would not be a proper body to make public appeals?—That is one reason.

1795. Might I ask whether that is your most serious objection?—No, I think not. I think the most serious objection is the objection of the service itself to the Admiralty having the control; the men might assume that some saving of Naval Funds would arise, or some saving of Greenwich Hospital Funds would arise, that the subscribed funds would be brought in aid; and therefore that the men would not gain so much as if these funds were in the hands of an independent body. Moreover I think the public would not be so willing to subscribe.

1796. But the cost of management would be reduced; that would be an advantage to the funds?—Undoubtedly.

1797. An amalgamation of all these funds and their being administered by the Admiralty would be advantageous to the funds?—Certainly.

1798. And consequently beneficial to the beneficiaries?—Certainly.

1799. Has any application ever been made to the Admiralty to allow the Patriotic Commissioners to administer the Greenwich Funds?—Not since I have had anything to do with it; but I have understood that there was a proposal of that sort.

1800. There is a tradition of that nature at the Admiralty?—Yes.

1801. That the Patriotic Fund Commissioners thought they would be a more efficient body to administer the Greenwich Fund than the Admiralty itself?—There is a tradition to that effect.

1302. Could it be verified?—I think it is possible.

1803. I think there has been a correspondence on that subject between the Admiralty and the Patriotic Fund Commissioners?—It is quite possible.

1804. And was that advance favourably considered?—I think not.

1805. You are expending your income almost up to the hilt, are you not?—Almost; in the current year we anticipate perhaps a larger surplus than we have had for some years; it may be about 3,000*l.*, but looking to the liabilities of the future we ought perhaps to accumulate at a greater rate than that.

1806. In spite of that, you are not building up a strong reserve?—No.

1807. You prefer to administer?—The claims are very pressing, and we do the best we can in re-investing funds. There are certain pensions which will fall in and leave no successors, and there are certain ground rents at Greenwich which will bring in some improved income later on; so the Admiralty hope they may be able to get on without greatly curtailing the present advantages.

Mr. Kearley—continued.

1808. With regard to overlapping, I suppose the Admiralty knows pretty well what pensions naval widows are receiving from all sources; they have some idea of that?—I do not think so.

1809. You would not be able to express an opinion as to whether there are cases there of overlapping; where, for instance, a widow is in receipt of a considerable sum of money, something larger, indeed, than her husband would have been receiving had he been alive?—I have no information about other outside funds; we do not get any communication from them, and do not know what they are doing.

1810. You have no experience of overlapping?—None.

1811. You do not suggest that there is much overlapping?—No; I do not suggest it.

Commander Bethell.

1812. I understood you to say just now that there might be overlapping in the case of the Patriotic Fund, but not in the case of the Exhibition Fund?—With regard to the Exhibition Fund, I can answer for it, but for the Patriotic Fund I cannot answer except in the case of the "Victoria"; I know that there was communication for the purposes of that fund between the Patriotic Fund Commissioners and Greenwich Hospital.

Mr. Kearley.

1813. The benefits derivable from Greenwich are well known amongst the seamen, are they not?—Yes.

1814. Every man looks forward to his augmentation of his naval pension by his age pension?—Yes.

Mr. Luttrell.

1815. I should like to ask about the frequency with which you pay pensioners; do you pay monthly or quarterly?—All the pensions from Greenwich Hospital to widows are paid monthly, not quarterly.

1816. Under the Patriotic Fund they are paid quarterly?—I understand that in the Patriotic Fund they pay quarterly.

1817. Do you find that it is more satisfactory to pay monthly?—I think it is very much more satisfactory from the point of view of the widows themselves. I have inquired a great deal into that, and I have had communications from persons interested in the families of the women and who know their habits, and they are unanimously of opinion that monthly payments are of a very great advantage.

1818. Why?—The women to whom these payments are made are not accustomed to the management of money, and the result of paying them quarterly is that in many cases where the money is paid at the beginning of the quarter, they are reduced to great misery before the end of it.

1819. So that in your opinion it is very preferable to pay the pension monthly rather than quarterly?—I am strongly of that opinion.

I may

Mr. Luttrell—continued.

I may say that only last month a letter was received at the Admiralty from the clerk of the guardians at Southampton, which has a bearing in this subject; it refers, however, to a man, not to a woman. It says, "The experience the guardians have had in the cases of the payment of pensions quarterly is that this occasions improvidence on the part of the pensioners, as they too often spend the whole amounts at once, and then become chargeable to the parish. If the authorities could see their way to revert to the previous custom of monthly payments of these pensions, the guardians believe that it would be conducive to the best interests of the pensioners." Pensions to men, whether from Naval funds or from Greenwich Hospital, are now paid quarterly.

1820. Does it very largely increase the work of the clerical staff to make monthly payments?—It gives a considerable amount of additional work.

1821. But in your opinion it is well worth the extra labour?—Certainly.

1822. By what process do you pay?—All payments are made through money orders in the Post Office; and of course the work of the Post Office is increased by monthly payments being made instead of quarterly.

Commander Bethell.

1823. At Question 1664, last time you told us that there was provision made in the estimate for a sum of 22,000*l.* for special pensions. Those special pensions I understand may be given before the age of 55?—Yes.

1824. Is the whole of that sum always taken up; are there applications to meet the requirements of which 22,000*l.* would be needed?—As near as may be. As a rule the Admiralty try to be on the safe side in spending money; not to exceed the amount in the estimate, because there is no sufficient margin to meet excesses.

1825. In this sort of thing you would have applications from persons in this condition which might vary considerably; some years you might not have many applications, and some years you might have considerably over the 22,000*l.* Taking that as a test with regard to the applications that come to you, would the 22,000*l.* about meet their requirements?—It meets all the pressing cases. The Accountant General forwards every month a statement showing what money remains to be spent, and how the money is going so as to keep the expenditure even with the estimates.

1826. There chanced to be a case under my notice the other day, and the procedure was there to apply to the Admiralty?—Officially all letters are addressed to the Secretary of the Admiralty. He is the corresponding official.

1827. He is the corresponding official?—He is the corresponding official for all communications.

1828. About the schools to which these 100 boys and 200 girls were sent, the reason was, I suppose, in the case of the boys, that there was not room in the Greenwich Hospital School for them?—No, the 100 boys are either too young to go to Greenwich School or physically unfit.

Mr. Luttrell.

1829. I would like to continue my questions as to the method of payment; have you any special terms with the Post Office for making use of their services?—The Post Office does the Admiralty work gratuitously; makes no charge against the Admiralty funds.

1830. Then I should like to ask you a question on another point, as to moral character. You stated just now that it was very rare to find an applicant who was not respectable?—Yes.

1831. Now, I should like to ask how you obtain the information as to respectability?—There is a certain form sent to the widows, and among other questions is one asking for a reference either to a clergyman or anyone she chooses. If she names a clergyman or a person in the district and we have not got any convenient way of consulting the police in that district, we apply to that person for her character; but it is her own nominee.

1832. You do not apply to the parson because he is a parson, but because he is named by the applicant?—That is so.

1833. And you would not go to the parson rather than anyone else in the parish?—No.

1834. Have you any code of rules, any hard and fast laws, by which you feel yourselves bound?—There is a scale of pensions.

1835. But I am now on the character of the applicant?—No; merely that the inquiries are generally made through the dockyard police, who are a branch of the Metropolitan Police, and they simply report what they find out.

1836. But do you send them a list of questions?—No; we simply send to the superintendent of the dockyard to request the police to make investigation as to whether the person referred to is worthy of the public bounty.

1837. In fact you get a general character from the police?—Yes.

1838. If anyone is named specially you apply to that person named?—If the police were not available just there.

1839. Do you make a separate inquiry as to the character, or do you await some report as to character; do you take it for granted that the applicant is of a good character, unless you hear something bad against the applicant?—No. We ask her in the form sent up, "to give the name and address of some minister of religion, or other person of position, to whom reference may be made respecting your circumstances." Those are the words.

1840. You put in the words "minister of religion"?—Yes, or "other person."

Mr. Kearley.

1841. That in every case?—In every case.

1842. Do you necessarily take up the reference?—No, we do not necessarily take up the reference; if we have the police available we should prefer to employ them.

1843. Although in your form which is filled up by the applicant you ask for references you do not necessarily take up; in fact, you make a practice of not taking up these references unless you hear something detrimental to the applicant?—We never take up these references at all if we find find that we can make the inquiry through the police conveniently.

1844. Do you make inquiries in every case through the police?—In nearly every case.

Mr. Luttrell.

1845. Then you are not bound by any code of rules, I take it?—Not at all.

1846. Then there is a difference between your plan and the plan of the Patriotic Fund Commissioners; you do not find it necessary to have any rules, and you think your plan a good one?—I think so; it has worked satisfactorily.

Chairman.

1847. Has it ever occurred to you that the withholding of a pension may lead a woman to follow a disreputable life?—We never withhold a pension unless she is already leading a disreputable life.

1848. And I gather that the inquiry is made in the first instance to satisfy you of the general good character of the applicant, but that it rests there for the whole period of your relation to her unless some information comes to you which causes you to make further inquiries?—Yes, that is so.

Mr. Kearley.

1849. The Admiralty, I think I am justified in saying, use these disqualifying conditions with leniency; I have in my mind a case of a man who was in prison and he lost his pension, and on his liberation the Admiralty restored the pension; that sort of leniency is frequently shown, is it not?—I have nothing to do with those pensions to men referred to now; but I can answer for the Greenwich Hospital pension that unless it is quite clear that the woman is undeserving, we should never think of withholding the pension.

Mr. Seale-Hayne.

1850. It is the practice, is it not, that when a special pension is granted, and the man becomes entitled to an age pension, there is a limit of the maximum that may be received, and the special pension occasionally ceases?—That is so.

Commander Bethell.

1851. You were asked just now by Mr. Kearley whether you were bound to give these pensions, whether it was part of the contract; and Mr. Kearley in his question asked if it was not the case that all persons were subject to the goodwill of the Admiralty. But, surely, it is the case that you are bound to give all pensions to men of a certain character if they have served their time, are you not?—The Admiralty have never admitted that in the case of Greenwich Hospital.

1852. I was going to say are not the Admiralty, in respect of naval pensions, bound to give the pensions?—I am afraid that the Treasury never admit that they are bound to give a pension. In a strict sense, I can hardly say that they are bound; but a man gets his pension as a matter of course if the regulations are complied with.

1853. But that is not the case at Greenwich?—Practically it really is, but the Admiralty have always insisted on keeping some control over it.

1854. Then your own only reservation is a sort of academical one?—It amounts to that in practice, but the Admiralty have very strong words in the notices in the Navy List, saying that these Greenwich pensions are given entirely at their discretion; and that question was fully argued before the Committee of the House of Commons in 1892.

1855. In the case of Naval pensions, provided the man is of a certain character, I think the pension is practically bound to follow?—Practically so.

1856. Do you consider the character apart from the certificate?—Certainly.

1857. Do you estimate your result by the number of "good" and "very good," and "exemplary" that appear?—Yes; a man's total character must not be less than "good," otherwise he cannot have the benefits of Greenwich Hospital.

1858. Does "Good" qualify for the highest pension?—Yes.

1859. And if it is "exemplary," what then?—It gives him nothing additional.

Mr. Kearley.

1860. "Very good" is the highest qualification you get?—Yes.

Chairman.

1861. In regard to dependent relatives do you make the same inquiry as to character and exercise the same supervision as in the case of widows?—The gratuities given to dependent relatives are really administered, not by the Greenwich Hospital Department, but by the Civil Department of the Admiralty. The case is sent to Greenwich Hospital for any remarks, and Greenwich Hospital finds money to pay them, but the actual administration and inquiries are conducted by the Civil Branch of the Admiralty.

1862. But the same principles of inquiry and distribution are applied?—I think not quite so strict in the case of mothers and dependents. When once letters are produced showing that the son has contributed, for instance, to the support of his mother and there is no doubt about it, I think there is no longer any question about giving a gratuity. The Admiralty only make inquiries into character in cases where they find there is something suspicious.

1863. Is there any limitation as to the nature of the relationship of the dependent relatives?—There is no rule laid down on that point.

1864. But generally speaking is it fathers and mothers?—Generally it would be a father, mother, or sister.

1865. You have told the Committee that by the mere circumstance of your being on the committee of the Royal Naval Fund you are able to guard against the danger of overlapping between Greenwich Hospital and the Royal Naval Fund?—Yes.

1866. Do you happen to know anything about the "Serpent" Fund administered by the Soldiers and Sailors' Families Association?—No, I do not.

1867. Or the "Royal Adelaide" Naval Fund?—No.

1868. But

Chairman—continued.

1868. But you are aware that those funds are referred to in a letter by Lord Spencer, written from the Admiralty on the 22nd of July 1893, and spoken of by him as fit subjects for inquiry in connection with the Patriotic Fund?—Yes.

1869. Is there anything that you would like to say with regard to your own experience of the Royal Naval Fund (we shall have an authoritative witness after you); but is there anything from the point of view of the Greenwich Hospital Fund that you would like to say to us?—I should like to say that the fact that Greenwich Hospital is represented on the committee of the Royal Naval Fund, and that the Assistant Secretary of the Admiralty also is a member of the committee, insures against the danger of overlapping, and the committee of the fund are kept fully informed of everything that the Admiralty has done for the applicants that come before them. The committee are, therefore, in a very good position to deal with their funds and prevent any overlapping.

Chairman—continued.

1870. But you have no touch at all with the "Serpent" Fund?—None at all.

1871. Nor have you personally any knowledge of the administration of the Patriotic Fund?—None.

Mr. Kearley.

1872. Do you ever apply to Lloyd's Patriotic Fund for assistance?—I have referred cases there with regard to getting children into Greenwich Hospital School. Lloyd's Patriotic Fund have certain nominations to that school in consideration of a large donation which was given many years ago; so that when a case happens that appears to be deserving, and that does not come within the rules of Greenwich Hospital, I have referred it to Lloyd's Patriotic Fund, and the child has been got in in that way through their nomination.

Colonel JAMES GILDEA, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

1873. YOU are Chairman and Treasurer of the Soldiers and Sailors' Families Association?—I am.

1874. But you have also had experience in regard to the administration of a number of other funds, the objects of which come within the terms of the reference to this Committee?—Yes, I have.

1875. Perhaps we might more conveniently dispose of those that have accomplished the end for which they were subscribed?—The Zulu War Fund was the first I was connected with, and the balance was handed over to the Patriotic Fund Commission the same year; I think it was in 1879.

1876. For how long was that administered independently?—Only for about two or three months, quite temporarily.

1877. And you have had no responsibility for it since then?—No.

1878. Can you tell us anything about the Afghan War Fund?—That was raised by a similar appeal which I had made for the Zulu War, and raised 4,000*l.*

1879. What was the particular object for which the appeal was made?—To relieve the widows and orphans of those who were killed during the Afghan War of 1880. At the same time, I received personally from the Indian Patriotic Fund and the Bombay Military Relief Fund 7,000*l.*, which I was asked to administer to the widows and orphans and dependent relatives on this side, of those who were killed in the same war.

1880. Had you any responsibility for originating these funds?—Yes, I had in the case of both the Zulu War Fund and the Afghan Fund. They were started originally by an appeal from me to the "Times" newspaper and the London newspapers generally.

1881. Had you any responsibility in originating the Bombay Military Relief Fund?—No, nor the Indian Patriotic Fund.

Chairman—continued.

1882. Both of those originated in India?—Yes.

1883. And after being dealt with by committees in India, the balance was handed over to you?—No, that was not quite so. They sent me 7,000*l.* to distribute on this side and to account for; they distributed a very large sum of money in India themselves; they sent me personally this 7,000*l.* to distribute on this side on their account.

1884. As their representative?—Yes.

1885. And then I think you have told us that the Afghan War Fund completed its purpose and is now extinct?—Yes.

1886. What is the position of the Bombay Military Relief Fund?—That is extinct, too. In the case of both of those funds, I simply distributed the amounts sent, and sent the accounts and receipts back to India, accounting for the sums sent to me.

1887. In regard to those you acted as their agent?—Exactly.

1888. In meeting the cases of those who had families resident in England?—Yes.

1889. Now will you tell us something about the Indian Patriotic Fund?—The Indian Patriotic Fund is one of the funds I have already referred to.

1890. But that is not extinct yet?—No, that is in existence; I know nothing whatever about the Indian Patriotic Fund more than that I received money from the fund during the late Afghan War to distribute.

1891. And how are the funds disposed of now?—If they have any funds they are in India.

1892. You are not able to give the Committee any evidence in regard to that?—No.

1893. Can you tell us anything about a fund known as "Lady Roberts'" Fund?—Yes; I was the treasurer on this side for receiving subscriptions for Lady Roberts' homes in the hills; and similarly I have handed over whatever subscriptions I have received to Lady Roberts when in India.

Chairman—continued.

1894. Then, so far as your function there was concerned, your function was obtaining funds to be expended in India?—Nothing more.

1895. With reference to the Soldiers and Sailors' Families' Association, would you like to say how far you regard your relations with the Patriotic Fund Commissioners as friendly or otherwise?—Not at all unfriendly. I think there is room for both the Patriotic Fund Commission and the Soldiers and Sailors' Families' Association. We work very much on different lines.

1896. You admit that the Patriotic Fund Commission is capable of work for which your Association is unequal?—Exactly.

1897. And do you claim to have local organisations covering the whole country, such as the Patriotic Fund Commissioners do not possess?—We do.

1898. And that those local organisations enable you to administer funds confided to you in an exceptionally advantageous way?—Yes.

1899. Please tell us as concisely as you can the general history and motives of your Association; when did it originate?—I shall be glad to be excused as far as possible from going actually into the initiation of the Association, as it is somewhat of a personal matter.

1900. Do you mean to say it originated in your own mind?—Yes.

1901. We may have the story, though it may incidentally reflect honour on yourself?—It really came about in this way: In 1885, during the Egyptian campaign, I made a similar appeal to that which I had done on previous occasions on behalf of the wives and families only, understanding at that time that the Patriotic Fund Commission would be able to look after the widows and orphans in consequence of, as I understood, the Soldiers' Effects Fund having been handed over to them one or two years previously. The original appeal was enlarged very shortly after, to include the widows and orphans, on our finding that the Patriotic Fund Commission was very much limited, and that they were not likely under any circumstances, as far as we could learn, to help those not on the strength. Shortly after the fund was started (it was similar to the previous fund, simply a war fund), I was told by several ladies of distinction that they would like to join and help in this work.

1902. May I take it that while the object of the Patriotic Fund Commissioners in the administration of their various funds was chiefly to have regard to the widows and children of men who had lost their lives in the service of their country, your attention was chiefly devoted to the care of families during the time that a soldier was actually in the field, or on service?—No, not exactly.

1903. But is it not your first rule that "the Association is formed for the purpose of aiding the wives and families of men of all branches of the Land and Sea Forces"?—Not only while they are in the field, or on active service, but at all times. Then, again, as far as the widows are in question, there are very many cases to which the Patriotic Fund Commission, under present circumstances, do not give any help whatever.

1904. Shall we leave the widows for a moment, and let me ask you, particularly, what you do for the families of soldiers actually during their lifetime, during their term of service. Your aid is generally of a temporary and immediate character?—Entirely temporary. We do not give pensions or annuities under any circumstances. We make temporary money grants, such as expense of doctor, nurse, death in the family, funerals, conveyance to hospital or home, hospital charges, nourishing food, payment of rent, of school fees, purchase or hire of sewing machine or mangle; and in many cases when a regiment is moved from one part of the kingdom to another, from say the North of England to the South of England, from England to Ireland, and so forth, we send the women who are not on the strength with their husbands. If I might be permitted I should like to hand in a table that roughly gives the objects we have in view (the Witness handed in a Table).

1905. Do you confine your assistance to the families of men below the rank of officers?—Yes, entirely.

1906. Do you obtain the co-operation of the naval and military officers?—Yes, most cordially.

1907. What kind of assistance do you receive from them?—We receive their moral support, which is the best thing that we can get.

1908. But to what extent do you obtain the co-operation of officers in giving aid to widows and children of officers themselves?—We have a very small branch attached to the Association (it is very small indeed) by which we give temporary help to officers' widows and children under some special circumstances.

1909. But that is in a sense apart from the general work of the Association?—It is quite separate.

1910. Now, in the Report of which you have furnished copies to the Committee, you show that the whole of the United Kingdom is divided into districts, and you have local committees established in those?—Yes.

1911. What duties devolve on those local committees?—That is stated in the rules at the end of the Report, just before the Appendix; if you turn to page 520 you will find them enumerated.

1912. It is the duty of those committees to obtain funds?—Yes.

1913. How far is the expenditure of those funds confided to the local committees?—Entirely.

1914. Under what kind of surveillance or control from the central committee?—That at the end of each year they have to make a return (you will see the forms on pages xviii, xix, xx, xxi, xxii, and xxiii of the Appendix) showing the amounts they have received, the amounts they have expended, and the cases they have relieved.

1915. Well, you also have presented us with, and I suppose you invite a criticism of, a statement of accounts?—Yes.

1916. I find on page 26 the accounts for the year 1894; you received in donations and subscriptions 1,345*l.*, and annual subscriptions from members members of the Association 907*l.*; taking that, with the balance in the hands of the different committees, you show on one side 6,918*l.* 16*s.* 0½*d.*, of which amount you appear to have expended 1,115*l.* 12*s.* 0½*d.*?—In the counties.

1917. But is there other expenditure than that which is made in the counties?—If you look at the balance sheet of the Association you will find it on page 13.

1918. Perhaps you will tell us this: am I right in saying that your income there from annual subscriptions, contributions, and dividends amounted to 1,457*l.*?—Yes; that is so.

1919. What was the amount expended in grants from the fund?—From London 148*l.* May I say that if you put the balance sheet of the Association accounts on page 13 side by side with the summary of receipts and expenditure which I show on page 26, which represents the working of the Association throughout the kingdom, you will have the exact position of the Association. Page 13 is the balance sheet of the council in London; the summary, on page 26, of the receipts and expenditure throughout the kingdom.

1920. Then may we take it according to the first one that you expended about 10 per cent. of your income in grants from the central fund?—Yes.

1921. That you spent 192*l.* in printing reports and circulars, and that you invested nearly two-thirds of the receipts?—As far as this balance sheet goes.

1922. As far as the general fund goes?—Yes, as far as the general fund.

1923. Then evidently it is not your policy to expend from time to time the funds as they come into your hands?—We have no limit as to our grants; whenever we get bonâ fide cases we relieve them.

1924. And you accumulate the amounts for which there is no sufficient demand at the moment?—Certainly. But may I say, with reference to that, that we accumulate it simply because we have no outlay in expenses. It is a voluntary work; there are no expenses of offices, or secretaries, or anything else.

1925. I was going to call attention to that fact, that I see nothing in the statement of accounts for secretarial work, office charges, or anything of that kind?—No, the charge here, 192*l.* 5*s.* 10*d.*, which appears large on the face of it, is a charge for that which is the keynote of the whole Association, the Report itself, and without which we cannot work.

1926. May I ask you to explain how the official work of preparing such a report is done, how the district associations are kept in relation to the central body; that must involve expense and labour?—This Report involves a considerable amount of labour.

1927. Is that a work which you voluntarily undertake yourself?—I do.

1928. As a labour of love and without remuneration?—Yes.

1929. What was the amount of the funds in hand altogether at the end of the year 1894?—The balance at bankers in London was 332*l.* 3*s.* 8*d.*, and the balance in hand of counties and divisions was 4,937*l.* 0*s.* 3½*d.*

1930. And any other fund?—And the investments.

1931. The investments amounting to what?—Roughly, about 20,000*l.*

1932. What page are you referring to?—Page 13.

Chairman.

1933. Where do you show the gross accumulated funds?—At the bottom of page 13. This represents the investments, amounting to about 20,000*l.*

1934. Then your resources appear to be large, and adequate for a large amount of work?—Yes, they are.

1935. But are we to understand from you, that with all these various forms of benevolent activity, you find the demands upon you so much smaller than the annual income available?—No, you may not take it in that way, because our last object is giving money. Our first object is self-help.

1936. And I think you desire us to understand that you desire rather to avoid the formality of a public fund, and to convey to those whom you are benefiting a feeling of kindness and sympathy, and personal interest in their welfare?—Exactly.

1937. And that you are able to do this through the agency of the good people whom you place upon the different district committees?—Yes.

1938. Then you say that you avoid as far as possible giving bonuses, money subventions, and that you pursue rather the practice of encouraging them to practise self-reliance and self-help?—Yes.

1939. And you have told us in what various forms of agency you do it. Is there anything further that you would like to say in regard to the general work of the Association?—I should like to say this: that you have overlooked in some sense a new work that we started about three years ago, and that is what is described as the "Nursing Branch." It affects rather the question of outlay.

1940. I will ask the question in this form: whether there is any other branch of your work to which you would desire to call attention?—Yes, the Nursing Branch that we established about three years ago with the approval of the general officers at several stations, and the medical profession. District nurses to look after the wives and families of soldiers and sailors at these stations; not to undertake midwifery, but to do everything short of that.

1941. In what part of the report does that appear?—You will find it at page 36. The rules as to the duties of district nurses are on page 39 and on page 40; the Report of the Curragh Camp Branch begins. We have at present six nurses established, who cost us not less than 500*l.* per annum; so that you may add that figure, strictly speaking, to our grants or outlay during the year. Last year I made a special appeal and got some few donations, a list of which you will find on pages 36 and 37, through which we were able to meet the expenses of these nurses; but that of course was only a spasmodic effort and will die away; so that these nurses will now fall on our general fund.

1942. Your work chiefly lies, I imagine, at places like Aldershot and the Curragh?—All over the country. Of course the greater part of the work is done at Aldershot, the Curragh, Devonport, Plymouth, Chatham and Dover, and large garrison towns.

1943. Have you found that you have received the co-operation of general officers?—Yes, almost universally.

1944. I see that you refer particularly to the co-operation you have received from Lord and Lady Wolseley?—Yes, and Lord Roberts, Lady Roberts, Sir Evelyn Wood, the present Adjutant General, Military Secretary, and many others. In fact, if you will refer to pages xxviii, xxix, and xxx of the Appendix, you will see the officers of both services who have been glad to speak in support of the work at our annual meetings.

1945. Do your presidents and vice-presidents and the members of the council generally include such distinguished personages as those you refer to?—Yes. I may say that every member of the Royal Family takes a personal interest in this work, and that they act personally in their own counties.

1946. The Queen is patron?—Yes.

1947. And the Princess of Wales is president?—The Princess of Wales is president.

1948. Is there anything in regard to your home-work further that you would like to call attention to?—I do not think so.

1949. Have you branches at foreign stations?—Yes, there is a very large branch in India, and I have just established a branch at Malta, the Cape of Good Hope, Natal, and I hope soon to establish one at Gibraltar.

1950. Now when troops are ordered abroad, leaving their families behind, what is your particular function?—The officer commanding the regiment, or his wife, generally communicates with our local office-bearers through this Report, and reports the advent of these women who are left behind to their different homes. In many cases, such as Aldershot, they insist now, since this Association was started, on the women, instead of remaining behind, being sent away from Aldershot and different places to their homes. We pay their expenses.

1951. To where?—To their homes; we pay their expenses to their home, and they then come under the local management of the office-bearers at their different homes.

1952. We have heard evidence with reference to the very admirable working of a system by which seamen are able to allot out of their earnings an amount for the support of their families which is paid to them through the Admiralty; do you know anything of the working of that system specially with regard to the families of seamen?—No more than that I am cognisant of it.

1953. How do you find the families of soldiers similarly situated provided for?—They are in a very different position.

1954. Not assisted to the same extent?—

Chairman—continued.

Soldiers as a rule make no provision whatever for their wives.

1955. And there is no arrangement at the War Office similar to that which exists at the Admiralty for acting as intermediary?—None whatever. Since the establishment of this Association, I have unearthed a War Office rule, which you will see on page 518, Clause 23.

Commander Bethell.

1956. Do soldiers never allot?—No, they never allot a halfpenny.

Chairman.

1957. But it is a common practice, is it not, for soldiers to remit by the post office from stations in which they are placed, to their families?—Not from India.

1958. Do you mean that the families, as a rule, of a regiment ordered to India are left entirely dependent upon their own resources?—Yes.

1959. How do you act in such a case?—If necessary, we support the women.

1960. I ought to have asked you whether, with regard to soldiers, for instance, in Egypt or the Mediterranean, it is not a common practice for them to remit to their families by post office order?—Yes, that is so.

1961. But, so far as you are aware, that is done quite independently by themselves without any assistance of an official kind?—Yes.

1962. You were about to call attention to something on page 518?—Yes. When I drew up these rules 10 years ago I found that this rule existed at the War Office; but, as a matter of fact, I find that it does not work very well for the following reason——

1963. Perhaps you will recite the rule first?—"The maximum amount which the Secretary of State for War has power to order to be stopped from any pay is 6*d.* per day from a non-commissioned officer not below the rank of sergeant, and 3*d.* per day from any other soldier below that rank." It does not work very well simply from the fact that the soldier can only be put under stoppage on the application of his wife, and she will not do it.

1964. But if the wife stated her case to the War Office, and asked for a stoppage, it would be within the power of the Secretary of State to make that deduction from his pay?—It is constantly done; there is power to do it. The officer commanding the regiment puts the man under a stoppage and remits the amount.

1965. What is the maximum amount which may be so deducted?—Sixpence a day from a non-commissioned officer not below the rank of sergeant; 3*d.* a day from any other soldier below that rank; that is all they can stop.

1966. And that, you say, within your own knowledge, is only done in a small number of cases?—We cannot make them do it, simply because they know, when their husband comes back, if they put him under stoppage, they will hear something more about it!

Commander Bethell.

1967. May a soldier apply to his commanding officer and ask that a stoppage may be made for his wife?—Yes.

Chairman.

1968. Do you know any case in which that is done?—No. I know cases in which soldiers send home remittances voluntarily, but not from India, because they find the expense of remittance from India so great.

1969. The question that Commander Bethell asked is, supposing a man voluntarily instructs his commanding officer to make a stoppage from his pay to send to his family at home, can it be done?—Yes.

1970. As a matter of fact, is it done?—It is done; but it is never done before a regiment embarks on foreign service.

1971. Can a man do it in India without expense?—No, he cannot.

1972. How would he incur expense?—In the transmission of the sum; he would have to send it by a postal order of some description.

1973. There is some little misunderstanding, I am afraid; I asked whether a soldier could not transmit this without expense; you say, "No, he must send it by postal order." What I meant to imply was that the soldier might apply to his commanding officer to correspond with the War Office, and the War Office, instead of transmitting the soldier's pay, would keep back a certain amount for the use of the family in England?—But the soldier's pay is not got for him in England.

1974. But, as a matter of fact, in the main (and we are endeavouring to arrive at a proper estimate of your work), when a soldier is on foreign service and active work the family are left in circumstances which call very much for your benevolent activity?—Yes.

1975. And you have told the Committee that you accept that responsibility, and that you do what you can primarily to enable women to earn their own livelihood?—Yes.

1976. Now you tell us also that in the case of the death of a soldier you show an interest in the welfare of the widow and children?—Yes.

1977. What particular form do your activities take in regard to them?—Wherever a widow is not entitled to receive any pension or benefit from any fund, the local organisation of the division in which she resides helps her to make a start in life, either, if she is a needlewoman, by buying her a sewing machine; if she is a washerwoman by setting her up with a mangle; or by finding her work and employment in some shape or form.

1978. But although I think you have told us that you avoid as far as possible giving your aid in the form of money grant, you do help a woman over temporary difficulties sometimes by monetary assistance?—Yes.

1979. And you find large demands upon you in regard to that kind of work?—Yes.

1980. But, still, the funds at your disposal are so ample that you are enabled to add to your capital year by year, and to accumulate a substantial fund capable of meeting any great emergency?—I will not go so far as to say capable of meeting any great emergency, because if a war were to break out to-morrow we should want very much larger funds than we have even laid by.

1981. In that case I suppose you would feel yourselves competent to make an appeal for further assistance?—Most certainly.

Chairman—continued.

1982. Even although Parliament has determined by the Act of 1886 that it was the duty of the Commissioners of the Patriotic Fund to accept the responsibility of appealing to such funds?—I was not aware of that. At the same time I will say that we should appeal to our local organisations and raise what funds we wanted.

1983. Now will you tell us something about the "Serpent" Fund which is administered by your Association; where shall I find that?—That (producing a Report entitled "The Soldiers and Sailors' Families Association, The Serpent Fund, 1891") is the only report that has ever been printed of the "Serpent."

1984. H.M.S. "Serpent" was lost on the 10th of November 1890 off the coast of Spain?—Yes.

1985. Where was the fund opened?—At Devonport and Plymouth and at the Mansion House.

1986. How did it come to be handed over to you for administration?—Because we raised the fund.

1987. Did your Association contribute in the first instance?—We headed the list with 500*l.*

1988. On what date did you make that contribution?—I think it was four or five days after the news came that the ship had gone down that we started the funds with 500*l.*

1989. I suppose that payment was authorised by the council of the Association?—I took upon myself at the meeting at which the Duke of Edinburgh presided at Devonport to say that, subject to the approval of the council, we should give that grant.

1990. You felt, I take it, that you had sufficient authority under the articles of the Association to take that step?—Yes.

1991. What was the amount subscribed?—13,639*l.* 17*s.* 9*d.*

1992. Did you regard that sum as being sufficient to enable you to make grants and permanent pensions of the same character as was given by the Patriotic Fund Commissioners?—We did not.

1993. Did you regard your work in connection with that as in relation to the other Departments of your activity as being of a temporary character?—No, we did not.

1994. For how many years did you make grants to the widows?—Eight years.

1995. How are the funds invested?—They are invested with the English and Scottish Law Life Assurance Company.

1996. Do they take any part in the distribution of the relief?—None whatever. We invested 10,800*l.* of that 13,000*l.* odd with the English and Scottish Law Life Assurance Company, who undertook to guarantee compound interest at 3 per cent. on all moneys remaining in their hands after the withdrawal of the quarterly payments, producing an equivalent endowment of 17,330*l.*

1997. What are the terms of your agreement with the company you have named, generally?—I cannot tell you exactly what the terms are, except that they pay quarterly this amount to our bank.

Chairman—continued.

1998. They pay over the interest?—They pay over the interest. You will find it there (pointing to the page).

1999. As a matter of fact, the statement you put in only brings up the account to the 22nd of June 1891?—That is so; the balance sheets appear annually in our annual report. You will find the last balance sheet on page xxxii of the Appendix. (Report 1894.)

2000. I was going to ask you what is the capital amount at the present time?—If you take the year in the table that I have drawn up, you will see what ought to be the capital amount at the present time; the fund has been running three and a-half years, and of that we have spent annually about 1,200*l.* a year; 1,223*l.* is the last amount.

2001. The capital amount is how much, do you say?—£17,000.

2002. And that yields an annual income of what?—The assurance company pay annually about 1,280*l.*

2003. How many beneficiaries are there upon that fund?—We have 66 widows and 78 children.

2004. Are the number of widows diminishing?—None have died; 16 have married again, but that does not exclude them from the fund.

2005. You continue the grants to the widows upon re-marriage?—Yes.

2006. Do you find that the fact of their being in receipt of this income is a recommendation to them; that they are more liable to marry than otherwise?—I do not say that; I think 16 is a very small proportion in four years.

2007. But you are aware that that is understood to be the experience of the Patriotic Fund Commissioners?—Yes; that is not my experience.

2008. Then your funds are ample to enable you to continue, as you do, these payments to widows, even after re-marriage?—Yes.

2009. What is the amount that they receive?—The widows of officers receive 30*l.* per annum pension for eight years, and we put by 100*l.* for each child when it reaches the age of 18 years.

2010. Do the children draw any payments during that time?—No. The widows of sailors with no children receive 3*s.* a week. You will find in that smaller report also the Admiralty pension opposite the different allowances. Widows of seamen, 3*s.* a week for eight years; with one child, 4*s.* a week, and so on; an additional 6*d.* after the first child.

2011. What happens at the termination of the eight years' period?—At the end of eight years a renewal of pensions to necessitous cases for a further period is to be considered with the balance of 4,000*l.* that will then be left; and further on, the payments reserved for children being allotted, the whole fund subscribed with accumulated compound interest will be absorbed.

2012. Now what pains do you take in assessing the amount of assistance that you may wisely give, to find the income of the recipients from other sources; for instance, do you communicate with the Admiralty as to the aid from the Greenwich Hospital Fund that they may have received?—With respect to this "Serpent" Fund, do you mean; yes, we did.

Chairman—continued.

2013. Does the income received from that, or from any other fund, affect the amount which you would award?—It did in the first instance.

2014. And have you discontinued that?—No, we have made no alteration in the amounts awarded.

2015. But supposing a woman to be in receipt of income from other sources and supposing another one to have no extraneous assistance, is your award the same in amount in both cases?—In the first instance it was so awarded; and that is where the local organization comes in, because these payments being made through our local office-bearers they would at once report if a woman was not a fitting person to go on receiving that award, either from her circumstances or morally.

2016. Do you withdraw grants in case of a woman being found to be of a disreputable character and unworthy of your assistance?—We should.

2017. But do you place yourself in communication with the Patriotic Fund Commissioners to know what they are doing in the case of the same persons?—We know that the Patriotic Commissioners never would help the widows from the "Serpent" Fund.

2018. Do you mean that you know that the Patriotic Fund Commission has no fund available for those who have become widows by loss of the "Serpent"?—We believe they have.

2019. You believe that they have a fund?—Yes.

2020. But, as a matter of fact, they knowing that these widows are aided from the Serpent Fund administered by you leave them in your hands?—Exactly.

2021. Will you explain how it came about that this fund was entrusted to your administration rather than being handed over to the Patriotic Fund Commissioners?—Well, I must confess that there was a very strong feeling at the time, especially upon the question of expense, in the administration of the Patriotic Commission.

2022. That the cost of administration by the Patriotic Fund Commissioners was large and extravagant?—Was excessive.

2023. Do you know how much per cent. would be charged against the "Serpent" Fund for administering this fund?—Yes, I can tell you. The first 18 months the administration of the fund cost 4*l.* 17*s.*; that is, 1,887*l.* 0*s.* 6*d.* cost 4*l.* 17*s.* to administer. The second year 1,280*l.* 1*s.* 6*d.* cost 3*l.* 9*s.* 10*d.* to administer. The third year 1,223*l.* 1*s.* cost 3*l.* 7*s.* 10*d.* to administer.

2024. You are giving us the actual cost of administration by the Soldiers and Sailors' Families Association?—Yes.

2025. What would have been charged against the fund had it been administered by the Patriotic Fund Commissioners?—I cannot say.

2026. Do you know whether it would have been 4 per cent.?—I understood that it would be 5 per cent.

2027. But you have not taken steps to inform yourselves, or to ask upon what terms it would have been administered by them?—No.

2028. Was

Chairman—continued.

2028. Was there any other reason which explained the transfer of the fund to your Association to administer?—Yes, there was a very strong feeling that there was a want of sympathy in the Patriotic Fund administration.

2029. That there was too much officialism, and too little personal sympathy?—Yes.

2030. May we not take it that the fact of your having yourself had so large a part in initiating that fund had something to do with its administration being given to you?—No, I cannot say so.

2031. Is there a separate committee or board having charge of the "Serpent" Fund as distinguished from the other?—Yes.

2032. Who is at the head of it?—The Duke of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha; it is given at page xxxi. of the Appendix of the large Report. The others are Sir Algernon Lyons, Rear-Admiral Church, Colonel Way, representing the Marines; the Reverend Mr. Sullivan, Chaplain of Devonport Dockyard, Miss Weston, and myself.

2033. Is there anything further that you would like to state to the Committee specially with regard to the "Serpent" Fund. What would become of the remnant of the fund after it has satisfied all the claims upon it?—There would be no remnant; the fund would be absorbed.

2034. You have so calculated your grants from it that the whole fund will be absorbed upon actuarial advice within the life-time of the claimants?—At the end of eight years a renewal of pensions to necessitous cases for a further period will be considered with the balance of 4,000*l.* which will then be left; and, further, on the payments reserved for children being allotted the whole sum subscribed, with accumulated compound interest, will be absorbed.

2035. You have so adjusted your grants as to absorb it within the lifetime of the present claimants?—Yes.

Commander Bethell.

2036. Then I suppose it is the case that at the end of these eight years a good many of the people may come upon the other funds, the Patriotic Fund or the Royal Naval Fund?—We shall not be able to support them any further.

2037. They will ultimately come upon these other funds?—They will ultimately.

2038. Do I understand that 66 widows and 78 children were the whole of those relieved by this money?—And dependent relatives.

2039. Do you know, at all, how many of those there are?—Out of 48 three have died, so that there are 45 left at the present time.

2040. Do they get the same scale of relief as widows?—No, not the same scale.

2041. Have you a scale?—Mothers and other dependent relatives receive pensions from 3*s.* 6*d.* to 5*s.* 6*d.* a week, according to the age of the recipient, for five years, not for eight years.

2042. Then at the time of the "Serpent" catastrophe, did you give any immediate bonus, any immediate relief?—Yes, immediately, within 48 hours.

2043. That was a lump sum that, so to speak, had to be given off the amount that you have?—We did more than that; we gave immediate weekly relief till we began to administer the fund, and then we distributed at once 2,272*l.* in bonuses and gratuities with the first quarter's pension.

2044. I suppose you carefully considered the question, having due regard to the narrowness of your funds with relation to all they have to do, whether it would be wise or not to withdraw the allowance to widows upon re-marriage?—Yes.

2045. And you deliberately came to the conclusion that it was best to leave it alone?—That was so.

2046. With regard to the children that you support, you do not send them to any school; you simply give the sum to the mothers?—To the mothers.

2047. You do not send the children to school?—No, except that we interest ourselves, of course, to get them into the Patriotic Schools, or other schools, as they come to the qualifying age.

2048. I imagine that apart from the "Serpent" Fund, in the case of the fund for which you are mainly responsible, the Soldiers and Sailors' Families Association, you may have more to do with soldiers than with sailors?—Yes.

2049. Have you an active organisation at the great naval seaports?—All, except Portsmouth.

2050. I suppose Miss Weston would cover the ground there, and that is the reason why you have not an organisation there?—No.

2051. What is the reason?—I should not like to say.

2052. There has been a difficulty in starting a branch?—Lady Clanwilliam started a fund when the "Victoria" was lost, and her wish was to keep it; it was exactly on the same lines as this Association.

2053. Do you happen to know, does it exist?—Yes.

2054. Was the ground already covered by Miss Weston?—No. I may say that Miss Weston cordially supports our Association.

2055. At all the other great naval ports you have an organization?—Everywhere else but Portsmouth.

2056. Have they good support in the naval ports?—Not from the Navy.

2057. Do you attribute that to the existence of local committees in the seaports other than yours?—No, not exactly that; I attribute it chiefly to naval officers not having taken up the work as the Army has taken it up.

2058. You think there is room for it?—Yes, certainly.

2059. The ground is not covered?—No.

2060. But the naval officers have not entered into the spirit of your Association in the same way that the military officers have?—No; and I think it is partly also because the system of allotments places the wives and families in a different position from that in which the soldiers' wives and families are.

2061. Naturally you have formed a strong opinion upon this question of the absence, or what you believe to be the absence, of the power of allotment in the case of soldiers?—Yes.

2062. And I apprehend that it would be a great great advantage if some system of that sort existed in the Army?—No doubt.

2063. With your Association, which is so extensive, have you ever made representations of that sort to persons who could bring it before the proper authorities? — No, not on that point.

Captain Norton.

2064. You say you have no organisation at Portsmouth; is that owing to the fact that there were certain local reasons which prevented your extending it to Portsmouth?—Yes.

2065. Were there special reasons which caused you to deem it undesirable to attempt it?—The naval officers' wives, who were very anxious to start a branch of this association in Portsmouth, thought it better to rest, and it would come all right in the end; but they thought it better to remain quiet at present.

2066. That it was not an opportune moment for developing it?—Yes.

2068. And you strongly advocate that some such system should be introduced with reference to soldiers?—Yes.

Mr. Thomas Bayley.

2069. I understand that you had an actuary's report on the question of giving pensions to the widows of the "Serpent" Fund?—Yes.

2070. You have not it at hand?—No, I have not.

2071. I suppose that would be a report which the actuary would give, allowing for all these widows the average time that they would live?—Yes.

2072. And that the fund would not be closed until all these widows were dead?—Yes.

2073. And that the children cease to receive from the fund when they are 21 years of age?—Yes.

Commander Bethell.

2074. The balance of 4,000*l.* will not enable you to pension off the widows? — No; only enable us to make selections of the most necessitous cases, and take a virtually new actuarial report as to how this 4,000*l.* should be divided.

Mr. Thomas Bayley.

2075. Then the actuary's report you had at that time only went for eight years?—Yes.

2076. It did not deal with the whole time?—In the absence of the report, I cannot bring my mind to bear exactly upon what it was; it is now four years ago.

2077. Have you ever thought of the question of winding up the capital account and buying annuities?—No.

2078. I notice in your report in Derbyshire you have a committee there; I think the Duchess of Devonshire is president, the Countess of Harrington vice-president, and several other ladies are on the committee?—Yes.

2079. You put their names here; do they do any business in Derbyshire?—That organisation in Derbyshire was only attempted to be started at the close of last year, and in consequence of Mrs. Chandos Pole, the Hon. Secretary of the society, having unfortunately to go to Madeira for the winter, the organisation was stopped until she returned.

Mr. Thomas Bayley—continued.

2080. And no work has been done?—Not yet.

Mr. Luttrell.

2081. I want to ask, if I may, whether you take into consideration the moral character of an applicant?—Do you mean to say with regard to the Soldiers and Sailors' Families Association?

2082. Yes?—Most decidedly.

2083. How do you get at the moral character?—Through our local organisation; when the wife of a soldier lives in a certain place, we have a local office-bearer, a lady (or a retired officer), who either knows of the existence of that person, or will make inquiries on the spot. The same with the administration of the "Serpent" Fund; it is entirely through these ladies that I administer these quarterly pensions.

2084. Then I should like to ask to whom you apply; do you apply to any one in particular, or generally?—If I have a case (frequently cases from India come to me straight), I simply refer it to the secretary of the Petty Sessional Division, and he or she at once makes inquiry, and if they find the case suitable or unsuitable, they do not refer it back to me; they deal with it themselves.

2085. Is the secretary directed as to whom to apply to for the character?—If the secretary lives on the spot he applies to whom he thinks proper for the character of the person living in his own neighbourhood.

2086. You do not direct him to go to one person?—No, not at all; they use their own discretion.

2087. I think, in some of these associations, they go to the clergyman in preference to anybody else; but you do not?—No, it is purely undenominational; we go to the Roman Catholic priest just as well as to the clergyman, wherever we can get the information.

2088. I wanted to get that point made clear. Then are you guided by a rule as to the character; do you say, for instance, that people who have not conducted themselves properly as servants, or anything of that kind, are debarred from the benefits of your association?—No person with a bad character would be recognised for a moment, unless a reformed character.

2089. But you have no hard-and-fast rule?—No, we leave it entirely to the local people.

2090. As to the payments; do you pay monthly or quarterly? — Do you mean the "Serpent" Fund? We pay quarterly. I have 107 payments to make; I draw 107 cheques payable to the woman herself quarterly, and with each of those cheques I send a separate receipt (Form of receipt handed in), and the woman signs the receipt, hands it to the lady, who gives her her cheque.

2091. Do the Post Office give you any facilities?—None whatever; we never asked them; and I should not like to do it through the Post Office; I think this is a better plan.

2092. Why?

Mr. Luttrell—continued.

2092. Why?—Simply because the lady in whose parish or district this woman is living knows all about her, and the fact of this lady going and handing her the cheque is much better than sending it through the Post Office, because of the interest it shows.

2093. It is all voluntary?—All voluntary. These ladies are in touch with these women all the year round, and if there is anything that goes wrong they report to me at once, saying the woman is not entitled to her pension.

2094. What objection would there be to paying monthly instead of quarterly?—I do not see any objection; it would involve on myself a very much larger labour, because the fact of drawing, even four times a year, 107 cheques, and 107 receipts, and bringing all this into ledgers and books, involves a considerable amount of labour; if I had to do that twelve times instead of four, it would greatly increase the labour.

2095. But you do not see any real objection to monthly payments?—No, I do not see any real objection.

2096. It would give you more work?—It would give me more work; and I have never heard in any single case that the woman would prefer her payment quarterly, instead of monthly; only one case during four years have I had an application for an advance of the pension.

2097. But in your opinion if you gave them the option would they not prefer to have it monthly?—I do not think so. You see they have their Admiralty pension besides; I do not know when the Admiralty pension is paid; perhaps it is not paid the same day, or paid so punctually as my pension is paid.

2098. The principal objection you have is that it will involve extra work?—Yes.

2099. Could not that difficulty be got over by making use of the Post Office?—I think this system much better than any Post Office system because it keeps the women in touch with the ladies.

2100. But could you not keep them in touch by having annual reports, and yet make use of the Post Office?—I do not think annual reports would be sufficient.

Captain Norton.

2101. You are of opinion that these lady visitors exercise a salutary controlling influence?—Yes.

Mr. Luttrell.

2102. I was addressing myself to this view: that the Post Office gratuitously give their services in some cases, and I was supposing they might do so in yours; that you might make use of the Post Office without any expense?—I am not at liberty to say as to that. I find this work so well that I should not like to alter it. May I say that, in many cases, we have been able through our local organisation to help with advice and in other ways far beyond the value of the money voted.

Mr. Kearley.

2103. With regard to the Serpent Fund, have you ever estimated what it would have done had it been invested on the same basis as these funds that are administered by the Patriotic Fund Commission: that is to say, if you had expended merely the income, and made it a permanent fund; perhaps it is not fair to say "spent only the income"?—I have not.

Mr. Kearley—continued.

2104. May we take it, broadly, that you arrived at this decision to work the fund in the way you are working it, because you felt it would realise more that way than any other way?—Certainly.

2105. You said there were as many as 66 widows and 78 children?—Yes.

2106. Out of a fund originally amounting to 13,600*l.*?—That is so.

2107. But in eight years time from the commencement of the fund it practically disappears?—Yes.

2108. So that you are able to give a liberal allowance, considering the amount subscribed, for eight years only?—Much more than we should have if we had invested.

2109. After eight years you have no idea what will happen to the widows?—No idea whatever.

2110. Perhaps the Patriotic Fund will be able to find relief for them?—We hope so.

2111. There is the little margin of 4,000*l.* which you have mentioned to us, but you do not expect that 4,000*l.* to do very much?—No.

2112. But in the event of a fund being ample, do you advocate the policy of exhausting the fund on behalf of the particular purpose for which it was subscribed?—Certainly.

2113. Take the Victoria Fund, for instance; there about 75,000*l.* was subscribed; is it your opinion from the experience you have in administering relief that those people, the widows and dependent relatives and children of those that were lost in the Victoria, are entitled to every penny of that fund?—Certainly.

2114. And that it is altogether contrary to the spirit of the people subscribing these funds that large surpluses shall accumulate and be utilised in different directions?—That is so, most certainly.

2115. And I think I might ask you whether you have really made a study of this very aspect of these public subscriptions?—Yes, I have.

2116. And are you frequently in touch with people that hold views similar to your own?—Continually.

2117. And is there a prevailing opinion that the Patriotic Fund Commissioners are not administering their funds according to the intention of the donors?—I should not go so far as that; but I think there is a very prevailing opinion outside—it is difficult to explain—that the Patriotic Commissioners are not doing what they ought to do.

2118. And that is not merely a personal opinion of your own?—No, not at all.

2119. But it is expressed by many of those with whom you come in contact in connection with your own administrative work?—Yes.

2121. You are not in any way antagonistic or rivals?—Not at all. I simply think there is room for both the Patriotic Commission and my Association.

Mr. Kearley—continued.

2122. Do you hold any communication with the Patriotic Commissioners in the way of seeking for information?—Constantly.

2123. Now, in this fund, in your fund other than the Serpent Fund, you appear to be accumulating money?—Yes.

2124. And you are not spending your income?—Yes.

2125. That is made one of the main charges against the Patriotic Fund?—Yes, I know that.

2126. But what do you propose to do with your surplus income?—Well, I consider we should have to go a good many years before we have sufficient laid by to meet the contingencies that would come upon us in the case of any war.

2127. Then you are building a by-and-bye fund, if I may use the phrase?—To a certain extent. And may I add another matter, which is also somewhat of a personal one, that it may be difficult when I am not here to get anybody to give their whole services for nothing; there may come a time when paid services will be required at the central office.

2128. You attribute your position of being able to accumulate just now to the fact that the expenses of administration are simply non-existent?—That is so.

2129. But when the administration of this fund or these funds has to be paid for, do you anticipate that you will cease to accumulate then?—I do not think the public would support it in the same way as they do now.

2130. You mentioned a figure in connection with the Serpent which I did not quite catch. I know you gave the amount subscribed, but you said something about 17,000*l.*?—£.17,330. That was the equivalent which the Law Life Assurance Company guaranteed to us: on our paying them 10,800*l.*; they agreed to give us back 17,330*l.*

2131. To give you it back in eight years?—I think it is more than eight years; you will find it in that small report. The children have yet to be paid their portions.

2132. You have no dependent relatives on the Serpent Fund, have you?—Oh, yes.

2133. How do you deal with them, by gratuities?—Some we paid off by gratuities, and to others we give, as I stated before, from 3*s.* 6*d.* to 5*s.* 6*d.* a week, old mothers chiefly, and according to the ages. That is only for five years; it ends next year.

2134. That applies to the pensions?—Yes, to the pensions.

Mr. Kearley—continued.

2135. Now, how long after the disaster was it before you began to administer these funds?—Forty-eight hours.

Chairman.

2136. What funds had you available in the case of the Serpent?—The subscriptions. I guaranteed that the Association would find the money at once.

Mr. Kearley.

2137. You collected the money at Devonport?—Yes, the fund was collected at Devonport, and at the Mansion House.

2138. Within three days there would be 1,000*l.* collected?—Yes.

2139. Where did you get your information of the loss of the vessel from?—The Duke of Edinburgh was commanding-in-chief, and wired to me to come down to him at once, and I guaranteed any amount that they wanted for temporary purposes.

2140. Where did you get your list of the crew from?—It was got at Devonport and Plymouth; by the Duke of Edinburgh.

2141. And it would be fair to say that owing to the ship having just been commissioned the list could easily be ascertainable?—Yes.

2142. But had the ship been in commission six months or for a longer period there might have been a difficulty through interchanging of the crew?—Yes, certainly.

2143. Under all circumstances do you consider that a month, or at the outside two months, would be a fair margin to allow an administrative body, say like the Patriotic Commissioners, to begin to administer its funds?—I should consider it a very long time indeed. I should consider that anybody who had power to administer funds should inquire and administer and begin temporary help if required at once.

2144. Did you express any opinion publically as to the slowness of the Patriotic Fund Commission's administration as to the loss of the Victoria. I have an idea that I saw a letter to that effect from you?—I cannot quite remember. I do not think I did, from the fact that I should have been sorry, representing this Association, to have been an opponent, in one way or other, to the Patriotic Fund Commissioners.

2145. You have, however, mentioned that there is a strong feeling against the Patriotic Commissioners on certain grounds; mainly on the score of expense of administration?—Yes, and want of sympathy.

Admiral Sir WILLIAM M. DOWELL, K.C.B., called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

2146. WHAT position do you hold in connection with the Royal Naval Fund?—I am the Chairman of the Executive Committee of the Fund.

2147. I believe you are also a Patriotic Fund Commissioner, are you not?—I am.

2148. Will you tell us how the Royal Naval Fund originated?—It originated by a sum of

Chairman—continued.

47,658*l.*, which was the surplus of the Royal Naval Exhibition.

2149. The Exhibition of 1891?—The Exhibition of 1891.

2150. And it was determined to apply that surplus to what ends?—To the relief of the widows and dependent relatives of men who die in the Navy. At first, I think it was intended specially specially for men who die by accident, who meet with a violent death; but when we found that all men who are killed in any way by accident or otherwise, or in action, get a pension from the Admiralty, then we decided that it should be devoted to the relief of widows whose husbands die absolutely in the service, but who receive no pension, and, in fact, receive nothing. We fill up that gap; we cannot give pensions, but we give grants to the widow of every man who dies in the service, who has died in the service since the 1st of January 1893, when we commenced.

2151. Is it sufficient that a man's name should be on the books of one of Her Majesty's ships, or in the Marines Division at the time of his death, to testify to the fact of his being in the service?—Yes.

2152. But your Fund began its operations on the 1st of January 1893; did you recognise any claimants upon the funds antecedent to that date?—None at all; we were obliged to commence somewhere, and that was the date we decided to commence upon.

2153. I think you have told us that a sum exceeding 47,000*l.* was the surplus remaining after all expenses paid of the Royal Naval Exhibition, 1891?—Yes.

2154. Has that sum been augmented from any other sources?—There have been a few donations.

2155. Will you tell us what the total income for 1894 was?—£1,484 10*s.* 3*d.*

2156. For the year ending the 31st of December 1894, as shown on the statement of accounts, your receipts from dividends and interest, from income tax refunded, and from subscriptions, amounted in all to 1,484*l.* 10*s.* 3*d.*?—Yes.

2157. And of that amount you expended what?—We expended 99*l.* 17*s.* in working expenses, and in donations to widows 1,031*l.* The first year our donations came to 713*l.*; the second year our donations came to 1,031*l.* In the first six months of this year they have amounted to 850*l.*

2158. Naturally the demands upon you are growing?—The Navy is very much increasing; we have a very much larger number of men in the Navy now than we had when we started; and also the Fund has become better known. We circulate reports everywhere. This year we have sent out 5,000, so that everybody in the service may know something about it.

2159. But do you apprehend that the amount at your disposal will be adequate to meet the increasing demands upon it?—Well, you see we have got now 80,000 men in the Navy, and if this year we double what we have given for the first six months of this year, that will make 1,600*l.*; our income is 1,484*l.*, and we have made no very strenuous endeavour to get subscriptions just yet, because, until we can say that we are absolutely in want of funds, perhaps we had better not do so. We have not tried to draw, but I have no doubt that when we come to expend our whole income and want funds we shall get them. At present, as you see, we have 1,384*l.* invested on income account; which we can draw upon at any time; when we overdraw our income in any year we come upon that money; but the capital sum we cannot touch; it is all invested and in the hands of trustees.

2160. You mean to say that you have accumulated a balance, a reserve fund?—We have accumulated partly, I suppose, because the fund was not sufficiently known and partly because we began very carefully at first and did not give very large grants; we have accumulated in the two years over our income 1,300*l.*; but I anticipate that this year we shall draw upon it, because we have now already in the first six months of the year given grants to the amount of 850*l.*

2162. Will you tell us how your capital is invested?—It is on this list; 2½ per cent. consols, East India 3 per cents., Great Northern Railway 4 per cents., Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway 4 per cents., Reading Corporation 3 per cents., Nottingham Corporation 3 per cents., and Metropolitan Stock 2½ per cent.

2163. I will not trouble you for those particulars; I will take it that the account is put in; but I was going to ask you who are the trustees of the fund; is it sufficient to say that it is invested in the names of seven trustees, of whom the Prince of Wales is one?—The Prince of Wales, Lord George Hamilton, M.P., Sir George Hayter Chubb, myself, Captain Sir Alfred Jephson, R.N., Sir Albert Kaye Rollit, LL.D., M.P., and Colonel C. H. Scafe, R.M.L.I.

2164. Up to the present time, are your benefits extended to seamen and marines only?—Seamen and marines only.

2165. What about warrant officers?—There is a clause in our rules that if at any time the net income of the funds at the disposal of the Society exceeds 3,000*l.* the benefits can "be extended to the widows, orphans, and dependent relatives of chief warrant officers and warrant officers in the Royal Navy and in the Royal Marines."

2166. But do you anticipate that they are likely to come into benefit from the fund?—I am afraid not at present.

2167. Then we may take it that the fund is available for and will be enjoyed only by the widows, orphans, and dependent relatives of the ordinary seamen and marines?—You see we should have to double our capital to get 3,000*l.* a year.

2169. How many persons are on it?—There are, I think, about 27; but the rule rule says that "the Executive Committee shall consist of not less than 21 persons, of whom a majority shall be naval or marine officers." We have the benefit on the committee of gentlemen, civilians; there is Sir George Chubb, and there are several others; there is Major Mackenzie, who belongs to the bank where we bank; he is one of the directors of the bank, and Mr. Langton, who is an accountant, and Sir Edward Birkbeck and other gentlemen who belonged to the committee of the Royal Naval Exhibition.

2170. Have you any Admiralty officials ex-officio?—No; there are several gentlemen from the Admiralty on the committee, Mr. Lambert, and Mr. Awdry, and Mr. Yorke, the Director of Victualling.

2171. I observe that the First Lord of the Admiralty in the late Government and the Financial Secretary of the late Government are there?—Yes, Lord George Hamilton and Mr. Forwood; Mr. Forwood was particularly active in starting the Naval Exhibition Committee, and Lord George Hamilton was a member of it.

2172. But you are aware that on the Patriotic Fund Commission there are representative men from the War Office and the Admiralty placed there ex-officio?—Yes, certainly.

2174. We have had very direct evidence to that effect from Sir Gerald FitzGerald and Mr. Lambert. Now will you tell us what is the nature of the assistance that you give to widows and orphans, for example?—They are all money grants. We give a grant of about 20*l.* to a widow and 2*l.* to a child.

2175. Is that given in a lump sum?—We do it generally through the ladies' committees at Portsmouth and Plymouth and the ports. If the widow happens to be living in the country, where we have no assistance of that sort, we do it generally through the clergyman of the parish or somebody who knows them. The form that we send up for them to fill up asks for the name of a minister of religion or some other person of position to whom reference can be made. Then we send this money. We first write to Portsmouth and Plymouth, for instance, to the ladies' committee, and ask them to be good enough to look up the case, and they send us an account of the position of the person and her circumstances, and whether the case is in immediate want or not, or whether it can stand over till our monthly meeting.

2176. The executive committee satisfies itself with regard to the character, the circumstances, and the immediate necessities of the applicant?—Yes.

Chairman—continued.

2177. And deals with them accordingly?—Yes.

2178. But supposing you make a grant of 20*l.* to a widow, say, with 2*l.* each for her children; is that sum held to be doled out from time time by those to whom you confide it?—Generally ladies give it at the rate of about 5*s.* a week, or if they think it will be more beneficial to set the widow up in some little business or something of that sort, it may be expended at their discretion in the purchase of a sewing machine, or a mangle, or the setting up of a small shop.

2180. You recognise the importance of making your grants as expeditiously as possible?—We have a meeting every month, and then every case in which an application is made is brought forward and the grant made at once; but if an application is made during the month and the case appears to be very necessitous, if the secretary thinks that from the circumstances of the case immediate assistance is required, 2*l.* or 5*l.* are sent down direct to the woman herself.

2181. In anticipation of the action afterwards?—In anticipation of the investigation which takes place afterwards.

2182. Then, supposing a second application to come?—From the same person?

2183. Yes?—It would not be considered. The grants that we make are considered final. In the first year, when we did not know what our income would stand, and what demands we should have upon it, we did make extra grants to all the widows; but it the only case in which we have done it.

2184. Can you tell us anything about the working expenses?—The working expenses the first year amounted to 9 per cent., and the second year they amounted to 6½ per cent.

2185. But in the first year you had to provide outfit?—Office furniture, and everything of that sort. You see if our income was double what it is our expenses would not be greater. We must have an office and we must have a secretary; there is more work than you could ask a person to do voluntarily, I think; and the same amount would be expended if we had 3,000*l.* a year to give away instead of only 1,400.

2187. And do you contemplate making an appeal yourselves for subscriptions?—As long as we have got an income balance of 1,300*l.* we do not think it would be advisable to make an appeal, but we think that in a very short time probably that will be diminished, and then we shall make an appeal, and I think with some effect; but at present, if we made an appeal and said that we had got a balance in our favour, people would not be inclined to assist us much.

2188. Has

Chairman—continued.

2188. Has it ever come under your notice that Parliament by the Patriotic Fund Act of 1886 threw upon the Commissioners of the Patriotic Fund from time to time to ask for and receive contributions from the public for such purposes as those you have undertaken?—Yes; but I understand that in the Patriotic Fund (being a Commissioner of the Patriotic Fund I know something about it), there is no fund except the Naval Relief Fund, that could assist the people that we assist at all, and that is a very small fund, and practically the people that we assist get no assistance anywhere else. They are people whose relatives have not been killed in the Service, or have not had any injury; they are people who die in their beds.

2189. But do not you know that the Patriotic Fund can maintain, educate and train children?—Certainly. When a widow has children we recommend them, not so much perhaps to the Patriotic Fund as to Greenwich Hospital school, and to the orphan schools; we get them taken in that way.

2190. But you recognise the fact that the Patriotic Fund Commissioners can give any necessary assistance to children of seamen and marines who may hereafter lose their lives in the service of the Crown?—Yes.

2191. The same class of children as those you have to deal with yourselves?—I think it is those who lose their lives in the service of the Crown. Now, with regard to these people whom we relieve, their husbands do not die in the service of the Crown; they must be serving when they die, but it is not from the Service; their deaths are not caused by the Service.

Mr. Kearley.

2192. There is an Admiralty definition of what constitutes losing life in the service of the Crown; there is such a definition, is there not?—Yes.

2193. If a sailor dies of cholera, that is not considered sufficient for a pension?—I think in the case of an epidemic, that is a matter in their discretion. I think that the Greenwich Hospital Committee, the Lords of the Admiralty, and Mr. Lambert, decide whether it is a case which will come under the Greenwich funds or not.

Chairman.

2194. The terms are that the funds available under the administration of the Patriotic Commissioners are for the children of those who may lose their lives in the service of the Crown or by or in consequence of casualties sustained or disease contracted in the service of the Crown?—Yes.

2195. Then you maintain that beyond that definition there are sailors and marines whose names are borne on the books of one of Her Majesty's ships whose children are not qualified under that regulation?—I think not.

Commander Bethell.

2196. And pensioners?—And pensioners.

Chairman.

2197. Then you tell us that you contemplate appealing for further funds as they may be required, and when you are able to submit to the public a sufficiently strong case of need?—Yes.

2198. And you contemplate that that work will be of a permanent character?—I think so.

2199. Now, as a Patriotic Fund Commissioner, I suppose you know something of the Royal Naval Relief Fund which was founded, if you will remember, at the suggestion of the Managing Committee of the "Captain" Fund, and was intended to provide for such cases as those with which you have to deal?—I think not. I think that, as a rule, assistance from the Naval Relief Fund would not be given to persons unless the death was in some way caused by the service of the country; it can be, but practically, I mean it is not.

2200. Is it not provided in the Commission by which that Royal Naval Relief Fund was established that it was intended "for the immediate relief of any special objects of destitution arising among the widows, orphans, or other relatives of deceased officers, sailors, and marines who have served in our fleets"?—Yes.

2201. "Or for the relief of such other objects of destitution as may come within the meaning and purpose of such benevolence;" that is very wide?—I have no doubt that if the fund was larger all these cases would come under it, but as the fund is at present, I think Colonel Young will bear me out when I say that unless there is some very strong reason no relief would be given from that fund.

2202. The fact is that the capital amount standing to the credit of the Royal Naval Relief Fund is 7,700*l.*?—Yes.

2203. That, of course, is a very small sum for the very large purposes which it is desired to serve?—Yes.

2204. But how far do you recognise the Patriotic Fund Commission in your work; you being yourself a Patriotic Fund Commissioner; how far do you work in concert with the Commissioners?—Colonel Young very often sends cases to us, but we never send them to the Commission. Any person that comes to us whose husband has died in the service, and is absolutely on the books of a ship or of the Marines, gets relief if their cases are bonâ fide; that is to say, if they are absolutely married, and if they are in want.

2205. Does it sometimes happen that those to whom you give immediate assistance in the way you have described become participants of the Patriotic Fund also?—I do not know of the Patriotic Fund, but there are several cases where we have given small relief to people who afterwards received pensions.

2206. From one or other of the funds administered by the Patriotic Fund Commissioners, do you mean?—Yes; we only give immediate relief. I see that twice in March of this year we gave 2*l.* to two different people, and they received pensions afterwards. If they had not received the pensions then they would have got the balance of what we should have given ordinarily, but

but we gave them the 2*l.* for immediate assistance.

2207. Pending the investigation by the Patriotic Fund Commissioners of their claim you gave them serviceable and timely assistance?—Yes.

2208. Will you tell the Committee what advantage you think this fund has in being independently administered over what it would have if it had been made over to the Patriotic Fund Commissioners?—Well, I do not think that the Patriotic Fund Commissioners could give assistance as we do. The Patriotic Fund Commissioners give pensions. Well, now our fund is not big enough to give pensions, and if it was lumped into the Naval Relief Fund it still would not assist to give pensions much; and therefore we consider that we do a great deal more good and relieve a great deal more of immediate distress on the death of the husband than can be done anywhere else.

2209. But as a Commissioner yourself, you know that the Patriotic Fund Commissioners administer the different funds placed under their care according to the terms of the trusts and instruments by which those funds have been raised?—Certainly.

2210. Is there anything to prevent the Commissioners carrying on the work on very much the same lines as yourselves, supposing that were made a condition of the transfer to them?—I do not see much objection to that, except that there is more circumlocution. We go direct to the object, and a person makes an application, and within a month we have the case investigated, and the whole thing is done and the relief has been paid.

2211. The last witness we had, Colonel Gildea, said that they were enabled to bring to bear an amount of personal sympathy, and a certain intimacy in the relationship of those who were charged as the almoners of this fund, which the Patriotic Fund Commissioners could not pretend to; would you say of your own fund?—Not of our own fund, because we do not do anything of that sort; we merely administer the fund.

2212. But you told us that you administer it through the agency of ladies and gentlemen who voluntarily undertake to dispense a lump sum which you put into their hands?—One is a committee of ladies belonging to a society, which I think they call the Royal Naval Friendly Union of Sailors' Wives. It was started by Mrs. Goodenough, and officers' wives and men's wives all belong to it; and in different places they undertake the work for us. Now, at Devonport the admiral's wife is the president, and Mrs. Bosanquet, I think, is the secretary, and we write to them. They have ladies all over the place who take up the special cases. At Portsmouth there is a similar society started by Lady Clanwilliam, I think, when they first went down there, and now carried on by the admiral's daughter, who does the same thing for us.

2213. But the Patriotic Fund Commissioners claim to have the advantage of being able to work in concert with local committees, do they not?—Yes, certainly.

Chairman—continued.

2214. But not in the same individual and personal way, you think, as your agents are?—I think not.

2215. Then you are in favour of continuing this fund under independent administration rather than of asking the Patriotic Fund Commissioners to accept the responsibility of disbursement?—I think it is much more satisfactory to go on administering it as we do.

2216. But surely if the Royal Naval Relief Fund were larger in amount, it would be competing very closely with you in the work that you discharge, would it not?—Yes, if it were larger in amount it might, but as long as the Naval Relief Fund only amounts to 7,000*l.*, I do not think it will ever be able to do very much. There are continually cropping up cases which they may take notice of, but they could not undertake to give a grant to the widow of every man who dies in his bed.

2217. But supposing it were suggested that the Royal Naval Fund and the Royal Naval Relief Fund should be amalgamated, you would think it better that their 7,700*l.* should be handed over to your fund than that yours should be annexed to the Royal Naval Relief Fund?—As a Commissioner of the Royal Patriotic Fund, I think it would be a very much better thing if it was handed over to the Royal Naval Fund.

2218. May I ask, do you know anything about the "Queen Adelaide" Relief Fund?—No, I do not.

2219. You do not come in contact with it in the course of your work?—No, I never have come across it at all.

Mr. Kearley.

2120. At the time of forming the Exhibition Fund, was the desirability of handing it over to the Patriotic Fund Commissioners for administration ever discussed?—There were discussions upon the subject, but it was decided that we had better keep it in our own hands.

2221. That is the opinion among naval men?—Yes.

2222. This fund is administered mainly by naval men?—We have on our committees several civilians.

2223. Sir Albert Rollit, for instance?—Yes; some of them are constant attendants. Sir George Chubb is of the greatest assistance to us in the matter of accounts and things of that sort. But principally we are naval men; naval men and officers belonging to the Admiralty.

2224. And do you think that the Royal Naval Relief Fund, if you could get hold of it, would be better administered by you than by the Patriotic Fund Commission?—I think it would augment our fund, and would be making that fund really useful. At present it is such a small fund that Colonel Young would tell you it is very difficult to find any person who really has sufficient claims to have the preference in such a small fund.

2225. And as a Patriotic Fund Commissioner I presume you are aware that with an income of 310*l.* a-year the average expenditure of the last eight eight years in that fund has been somewhere about 36*l.* a-year?—Yes.

2226. So that there is a large income which is not being expended; now, could you not find for the Royal Patriotic Fund Commissioners eligible persons that might come on that fund, some of whom are applying to you; possibly you are not able to relieve all that do apply to you?—We relieve everybody who comes within our rules. Now, the people who I think are the hardest treated are the widows of pensioners. I really scarcely know of any funds that can assist them. I think if there was a sufficient fund those would be the people who would be very much benefited by it, if the Naval Relief Fund were large enough to help them.

Commander Bethell.

2227. You help the widows of pensioners, do not you?—No; the rule is if a person dies who is on the books of a ship or in the Marine Division. If you go to pensioners, you see it is an enormous thing.

Mr. Kearley.

2228. But it seems so very extraordinary to some of us that the Patriotic Fund Commissioners cannot find enough people eligible to go on this Royal Naval Relief Fund; they really cannot find sufficient people to relieve; they have got an income of 310*l.*, and they are spending about 36*l.* on an average; last year, 96*l.*; the preceding year the expenditure was about 33*l.*?—The difficulty, as it appears to me, with the Patriotic Fund Commissioners, in expending that money, is to find people who sufficiently require it in excess of other people; whose wants are much more than those of other people. If you give it to one person another person may say my claim is just as good as that person's, and there may come 100 people saying just the same. It is only a small fund, and it requires some special want or some special distress.

2229. That was the view that was put to us by Colonel Young; that they found it better not to expend it at all?—I think that if a sufficiently deserving case comes before the Naval Relief Fund, it will be relieved; but the difficulty is to get those special cases and not have too many of them. If you say that simply because a man dies, his widow is to be relieved from that, you would have so many of them that you would not be able to do it.

2230. But, in regard to your own particular fund, the Exhibition Fund, it is the intention, I presume, of those who administer it to expend the income yearly?—Yearly, certainly.

2231. You did not quite do that at the commencement?—We have not done that at the commencement. You see we have got 1,300*l.* now, but our income is 1,400*l.* a year, and this is the third year of our working, and in the first six months of this year we have expended 850*l.*

2232. So that your yearly expenditure is increasing, and your income is remaining fixed?—Our income is remaining the same.

Chairman.

Mr. Kearley.

2234. And it will be the policy of the Exhibition Fund Executive to expend its income?—Yes.

2235. And not to accumulate funds?—We do not want to.

2236. Not on the principle of the Patriotic Fund Commissioners?—We propose to ourselves to expend our income every year, and when we find that we have spent our income then we shall go to our friends, and say, "Help us!"

Chairman.

2237. But surely you are not particularly anxious to get rid of that reserve fund?—I am not; but what we feel is (and I do not think you will consider we are wrong), that it is of no use going to our friends to ask for assistance when we have a balance in hand; but I live in hopes that the fund will prove so useful that we shall be able to get in large funds; and the time will come, I hope, when we shall have 3,000*l.* a year, and then we shall be able to assist warrant officers' widows as well.

Mr. Kearley.

2238. You hope to get additional funds by making appeals to the public?—Yes.

2239. You do not hope to get funds from the public unless you can show that you expend what you have already?—I do not think we ought to expect them.

2240. The Patriotic Fund Commissioners have no delicacy of that sort; they have continued to ask for funds when they were not expending the income?—I do not think the Patriotic Fund Commissioners ask for funds.

2241. They have funds handed over to them?—Yes.

2242. But you are in that position that you will be able to ask for funds?—Certainly.

2243. As regards the expenses, you draw attention to the fact that, owing to the smallness of the fund, they are necessarily higher than they would be if you had a large volume of money to administer?—Of course.

Commander Bethell.

2245. There are certain funds that we lose in the Navy, which it is rather felt our men have a right to for compassionate allowances and things of that kind, are there not?—Yes.

2246. There are the men's effects, unclaimed dead men's effects, and is not there some portion of the savings?—Yes.

2247. And are there not certain funds that arise arise from men being in prison, that have been claimed by naval authorities?—Yes, for years the Navy have been hoping to get hold of them. I do not exactly know what the amounts are. There is also a portion of the savings for rations which many officers think we might have.

Mr. Thomas Bayley.

2248. I understand that the corresponding amount to the Soldiers' Effects Fund which the Patriotic Fund is administering, in the Navy, goes into the Government's pocket?—I suppose it does; it does not come into ours.

2249. But with the Army it goes into the Royal Patriotic Fund?—Yes.

2250. And you claim that the same sum corresponding with the Soldiers' Effects Fund should come into your fund?—Yes, we should like to have it.

WILLIAM WOODALL, Esq., IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. WILLIAM ARTHUR MOORE, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

2251. WILL you tell the Committee what your position is under the Lords of the Admiralty?—I am a Senior Clerk at the Admiralty, in the Victualling Department.

2252. You act as Honorary Secretary to the Queen Adelaide Naval Fund?—I do.

2253. You are aware that this Committee is instructed to inquire into the administration and financial position, not only of the funds controlled by the Royal Patriotic Fund Commissioners, but of such other Funds as may be available for the relief of widows, orphans, and dependent relatives of soldiers, sailors, and marines?—I am.

2254. I suppose the Queen Adelaide Naval Fund comes within the category?—It is more a private fund in reality than a public fund.

2255. But still it is within that category?—I suppose it would be within the range of your inquiry.

2258. Is the relief from the fund limited to a certain class of recipients?—It is limited to the unmarried orphan daughters of naval and marine officers.

2259. The funds are applied I see, in the first place, to "the education of the young"?—Yes.

2260. And in the next place to "the maintenance of the aged," and "the casual assistance of those who are in temporary difficulty"?—That is so.

2261. What is the amount of the capital of the fund?—The amount of stock standing in the name of the trustees on the 31st of December 1894 was 3,724*l.* 10*s.*

Chairman—continued.

2262. The whole of that money comes from voluntary subscriptions, does it not?—Yes, from voluntary subcriptions.

2263. Is it augmented from time to time; are you still receiving subscriptions for the fund?—Yes, we increase our stock from year to year; directly a certain amount of money is available it is invested in stock. I might say that all donations are invested, and all subscriptions are paid away at once in grants.

2264. By the prudent administration of your fund, has it increased between the 31st December 1893 and the same date in 1894?—It has increased. We have been able to invest over 100*l.* in stock during that period.

2265. You have increased your capital within twelve months by a little over 100*l.*?—Yes, about 114*l.*

2266. You have explained, I think, that anything given to you in the form of donation is added to the capital and invested, while sums received in the form of subscriptions are applied at once for the purpose of the Fund?—Yes, plus the interest we get on our stock.

2267. You treat that as your annual income?—We treat that as our annual income.

2268. Am I right in saying that the annual subscriptions last year were 104*l.*?—That is so.

2269. And about the same amount was received from dividends?—That is so.

2270. Will you tell the Committee in what way that money is expended; I do not know whether you have taken the trouble to work out the percentage of the cost of management, and so on?—I have not taken that out, because the working expenses are so very small; there is no paid secretary or office expenses, as is stated in the Report of the fund. You will see, on page 4, the working expenses are referred to as being "exceedingly small, there not being any paid officers or office charges." The only expenses which fall upon the fund are in the way of advertisements, small matters of stationery, printing and postage.

2271. What is the object of the advertisements?—The object of the advertisements is to bring the fund before the public, and principally before before naval officers and marine officers; we advertise it in the Navy List.

2272. Is the object of the advertisements to obtain subscriptions?—It is.

2273. Not to attract the notice of those who might be entitled to be beneficiaries?—No; it is not with that view.

2274. Will you state the amounts expended in grants during last year?—The amount given in grants amounted to 232*l.*

2275. Is that about the average expenditure in gifts and benevolencies?—Yes, it is; in the previous year it was 236*l.*

2276. What is the general modus operandi of inquiry into the cases and administering this relief?—We have a Ladies' Committee, of which the honorary secretary is Miss J. E. Lewin. That Ladies' Committee investigates the claims of the various applicants and make inquiries. This Committee recommends to the general Committee grants to be made to those applicants which are considered most necessitous and deserving. The General Committee confirms, alters, or cancels such grants as it deems advisable.

2277. Do the ladies on that committee live in London?—They mostly live in London, but some of them are frequently visitors at the different naval ports from which our applicants chiefly come.

2278. Where are the meetings of that committee generally held?—The Ladies' Committee generally meets at the room of the Royal Naval Female School in Sackville-street; I cannot quite remember its present name at the moment; it has altered its name within the last year or so, but that is the original name and the designation by which we call it.

2279. Are your grants given generally in the form of gratuities, or as periodical payments?—They are generally given as a donation or grant right out. Sometimes a case might come before us in which the ladies might think it advisable that the money should not be given right out, but should be given in small grants until it is expended. Supposing, for instance, a grant of 10*l.* is made to a lady, the committee may not think, perhaps, the lady is quite capable of looking after it as she should, and may consider it better that she should have it in certain small weekly amounts until it is expended.

2280. Are those sums remitted by you?—They are not remitted by me; they are remitted by the honorary secretary of the Ladies' Committee, Miss Lewin.

2281. In what way is the payment made, through the Post Office, or directly by personal communication?—The honorary secretary may employ somebody who knows the lady, and who is living in the immediate vicinity, and remit the money in that way. We had one case in which the recipient was living in the East-end of London, and in that case I think it was done through a city missionary.

2282. You said that relief under your fund was limited to unmarried orphan daughters of naval and Marine officers; would those be officers above a certain rank?—They are supposed to be of wardroom rank.

2283. Are you aware what other funds exist which are applicable to the same class of persons?—There is, of course, the Royal Naval Benevolent Fund, which frequently assists the same applicants as we assist.

Chairman—continued.

2284. Do you keep yourselves in communication with that and such other funds as may be available for the same class of persons?—Our form requires applicants to fill up where they have received assistance, and all these different funds are stated on our form, and they are supposed to give us a full and particular account of what they have received from other societies.

2285. You, of course, are aware of the particular danger that is apprehended by all those who are entrusted with the distribution of a fund of that kind, namely, the danger of overlapping?—Quite so.

2286. You, in administering the business of the fund, do what you can to guard against that danger?—We do; that is the reason why we have that form filled up. We also put ourselves frequently in communication with the Admiralty itself, who have a charitable fund. The form requires the applicants also to fill up a statement with regard to the charitable fund, specifying whatever they may receive from the Admiralty in the way of a small pension or in the way of periodical grants, because frequently a distressing case comes before the Admiralty, and they have this charitable fund from which they can give money to relieve it.

2287. How many cases are relieved from your fund in the course of the year?—In the course of the year we should have between 40 and 50 applications, and of that number perhaps between 30 and 40 would be relieved.

2288. An average of 30 or 40 young ladies would be assisted during the course of the year?—Yes; but the style "young" is not quite accurate, as the majority of the ladies we assist are mostly elderly and frequently very aged.

2289. Within what figures do the grants range in amount?—They range from 4*l.* to 10*l.*

2290. Rerely exceeding 10*l.*?—Very rarely exceeding 10*l.*

2291. Are the cases open to be reconsidered, and fresh grants given from time to time?—The grants are made half-yearly, and as a rule we never make a second grant within the year. We make an annual grant, but that is always reconsidered year by year; the applicants have to make a fresh application and fill up a fresh form.

2292. You are aware that there are those who think that there would be greater economy and safety if all these funds were administered by a single body?—I am aware of that.

2293. Would you indicate to the Committee what would be the advantage, and what might be the apprehended disadvantage, of an amalgamation of this fund under a body such as, let me say, the Patriotic Fund Commissioners?—With regard to this Queen Adelaide Naval Fund, I may say it has always covered a class of people who have not had any direct claim upon any other charitable fund, such as the Royal Naval Benevolent Fund, upon which there is a direct claim on the part of certain people; that is to say, widows and daughters of subscribers are entitled to a grant after due consideration by the committee. In the case of the Queen Adelaide Naval Fund we take anyone who is the unmarried orphan daughter of an officer, without regard to whether their parents have been subscribers, scribers or not; there is no direct claim in that way upon the fund.

2294. You are aware that several funds have been entrusted to the Patriotic Fund Commissioners to be administered according to the conditions of the trust on which the fund was established?—I believe there have been.

2295. So that there would be no difficulty in the Patriotic Fumd Commissioners accepting the responsibility of administering this fund upon any conditions which might be attached to it in the event of transfer?—I presume that would be so.

2296. I suppose, from what you have told the Committee as to the very small expenditure for personal service in this matter, you can hardly look for any economy to result from such a transfer?—There would be no economy, I should anticipate.

2297. Even though the Patriotic Fund Commissioners charge only four per cent. for the administration of the funds entrusted to them?—You can see by the balance-sheet that the expenditure in the course of the year was only about 10*l.* in 1894, against 13*l.* to 14*l.* the previous year; but that was abnormal, because in that year we printed a report. We only print a report every second year; in that way we keep down the expenses. It was thought unnecessary, as the fund was small, to issue an annual report.

2298. I rather invite you to tell the Committee any special advantages that you think the fund enjoys by being administered as it is by a voluntary committee. It has been claimed by a previous witness that in the administration of funds by volunteers who accept the responsibility, a larger amount of personal sympathy is imported into the work than would be the case with publicly constituted commissioners; do you think that is so in your case?—I think that would be so in this case.

2299. Do you think that the applicants for assistance are brought more directly into personal relations with benevolent people who besides administering the money grant are able to give the advantage of personal assistance, and a sort of sympathetic aid?—That is so. I think many of our applicants receive personal sympathy and help from the Ladies' Committee, which they would lose if it became a public fund under the Patriotic Fund Commissioners.

2300. I ought, perhaps, to have asked you before, is the character of the assistance which is given limited to the mere money help afforded?—As the fund stands in itself it is limited to the mere monetary assistance, but there are many ladies on the Ladies' Committee who sympathise with the distress of the applicants, and frequently assist them in kind, either in dress or anything of that sort that they may require.

2301. As an officer of the Admiralty do the Lords of the Admiralty allow you facilities for the work you have to do as honorary secretary to this fund?—The work is done after office hours. It does not occupy a very large amount of my time, and I have the work to do after my official duties are over.

2302. But I may take it that the fact of your being in familiar touch with the Admiralty work, and especially with the administration of Admiralty funds, gives you a peculiar advantage in the management of your fund?—It does give me a certain advantage in the management of it.

Captain GEORGE JOHN HAMILTON, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

2303. YOU are the secretary to a fund subscribed for the relief of sufferers by the Mutiny in India?—Yes.

2304. That fund was established, was it, in 1859?—No, 1857, immediately after the outbreak of the Mutiny; 1857, 1858, and 1859.

2305. What was the particular definition of the object for which the fund was subscribed?—For the relief of sufferers by the Mutiny in India. I think it is on the face of the Report which you have.

2306. Yes, I have so stated it. But did the term "sufferers" comprehend all persons concerned, or did it merely have reference to widows, orphans, and others?—Yes, all relatives of men who were killed in India prior to the 31st March 1859, who were dependent in any way pecuniarily upon those who were killed.

2307. Did you reserve power to assist the men themselves who were wounded?—To a certain extent, at the outset. There were a large number of invalided soldiers sent home, wounded men, and the committee assisted them with 6*d.* a day for three months at the time; and there are still some 16 soldiers on our fund.

2308. Sixteen survivors of the Mutiny?—Yes, men who lost arms or legs or who were badly wounded.

2309. Were these men of whom you are speaking, who still benefit by your fund, not entitled to assistance from Chelsea from the Crimean Veterans' Fund?—I think not. I have had many applications which have been referred to me from the Patriotic Fund.

2310. I am not speaking of the Patriotic Fund, I am speaking of the fund administered by the Commissioners at Chelsea for the relief of Crimean and Indian Mutiny veterans?—I do not think they ever assisted the Indian Mutiny veterans; they were always referred to the Indian Mutiny Fund, which is a fund per se for that service.

2311. Are you not aware of the fact that men who served for 10 years in either the Crimea or the Indian Mutiny, or in both, are entitled to and are now in large numbers receiving a pension?—I am not aware personally that any man who served in the Crimea or Indian Mutiny is receiving relief from the Patriotic Fund, and also at the same time from us; I think not.

2311*. Are you not aware that soldiers actually wounded in those wars would be entitled to pensions independently of the period of their service?—Decidedly; a small pension.

2312. But you inform yourselves in regard to those men when they are receiving relief from other funds, and that determines the amount of grant given by you, does it. In allocating your own funds; do you take into consideration the amounts which the applicants may be receiving from Chelsea, from the Patriotic Fund, or from any other source?—Every inquiry is made at the outset as regards the circumstances of these applicants, and if they are receiving relief from other funds they would not get it from ours.

2313. Although I ventured to ask you those questions relating to the men surviving, the range of our instructions is bounded by the question of widows and orphans and other dependent relations?—I understand so.

2314. What form of assistance do you give to persons who come within those several classes?—I have here a small paper that was issued giving the rules under which widows of soldiers, seamen, &c., and their children were admitted, with the rates of allowances (handing in the same).

2315. Let me take you back again to the circumstances under which the fund was subscribed; what was the total amount subscribed for that purpose?—I will submit the last balance-sheet. The total amount up to date subscribed was 440,968*l.* 13*s.* 10*d.* Up to the end of March last the interest on that fund has amounted to 184,546*l.* 0*s.* 6*d.*

2316. Are you still continuing to receive subscriptions to the fund, then?—There was one small legacy in 1882; that was the last.

2317. Can you tell me what the amount of your capital is at the present moment?—The present balance is 46,256*l.* 15*s.*

2318. Then you have expended of the original capital subscribed the interest received upon the investment of that capital, and certain accruing subscriptions have enabled you to expend up to the end of last year more than half-a-million of money, is that so?—Yes, the total expenditure up to 31st December last has been 583,610*l.* 5*s.* At the outset there was remitted to India 140,286*l.* 18*s.* 7*d.* for the immediate relief of sufferers in India, and we still pay about 400*l.* per annum in India to 11 pensioners there. In England we have spent up to March last in allowances to widows of officers, civilians, soldiers, and marines, 404,378*l.* 5*s.* The office expenses from 1857 to the present time are 27,719*l.* 17*s.* 2*d.* I will leave those papers with you (handing in the same).

2319. I omitted to ask you whether the fund was available for natives, or were the benefits confined to English poor?—Only Europeans and Eurasians.

2320. Can you tell the Committee what is the annual expenditure at the present time in allowances and donations?—Last year the expenditure was 5,649*l.* 14*s.* 10*d.*, inclusive of 448*l.* 8*s.* 4*d.* office expenses.

2321. And you have pensioners still on the fund numbering 223?—Yes.

2322. Of course the number of claimants upon the fund is steadily diminishing year by year?—It is; but still occasionally they come back again under one of the rules. It is administered on the same lines as the Indian funds are. For instance, the widow of an officer in the Indian Army gets a pension; if she marries she loses it; but if she is widowed again she reverts to the fund.

Chairman—continued.

2323. Is your fund available for the survivors of men of all ranks?—All ranks.

2324. Officers as well as private soldiers?—Yes.

2325. And sailors?—Yes. The pensions to officers' widows are of course on a larger scale than to those of soldiers and others.

2326. They are graded according to rank?—Yes. Officers' sons were originally educated up to the age of 18; and then we put some into Sandhurst and gave them an outfit when they went into the Army, providing in some way for all. There are some surviving daughters still on the fund, and they have their pensions till they are married; if they marry they go off the fund.

2327. In inquiring into the applications from widows for example, according to your rule you have told us that you inquire into their circumstances?—Yes.

2328. Do you make any inquiries as to their character and industrial disposition?—Most minute inquiry is made into every application, and has been from the very commencement each quarter, before payment.

2329. I see it is stated in the rules that you have handed in, that it is not intended that widows shall live in idleness on the funds?—Exactly.

2330. That your fund is intended rather to assist them in making their way in life than to maintain them as dependent upon the fund?—Yes; and to ascertain what they are about, I send out every quarter to all the gentlemen, clergymen, and officers who pay these widows, a paper (I have not one here, but I could send you one), a printed form asking those gentlemen to reply to the following questions: "Is this woman living a fair and proper life?" "Is she still entitled to the benefits of the fund?" "Is she in service?" "Whether she is married again?" And that comes back before I issue the pay to that widow. Every inquiry is made as to their character and everything.

2331. In the event of a widow remarrying, does she cease drawing from the fund?—For the time being.

2332. But if she again becomes a widow, is she re-admitted?—She is re-admitted, on proper references as to character.

2333. Her application is considered as a fresh one?—It is reconsidered entirely, and it depends upon her character whether she is re-admitted or not.

2434. Will you please to state what are the amounts usually paid to widows?—It is all on the scale before you; it has never been altered. I may state, regarding that last remark, that it has never been altered, that some 10 years back, I think it was, there was an ascertained surplus, and the committee granted an extra 2*l.* per annum to all the soldiers' widows then on the fund.

2335. You found yourselves in a position to make that additional allowance?—Yes; and we also gave an addition grant to all the ladies on the fund as well as the widows.

2336. The childless widow of a private soldier, for example, receives 5*s.* a week, does she?—Yes; she now receives actually more;

5*s.*

Chairman—continued.

5*s.* a week is 13*l.* per annum, and she now receives 15*l.*, with the extra 2*l.* I mentioned.

2337. And that amount is increased according to the number of children that a widow may have?—Yes.

2338. So that if the widow of a private soldier has four children to maintain she draws a minimum of 9*s.* 6*d.* a week?—About that.

2339. On the other hand, the widow of a staff non-commissioned officer who has four children draws 12*s.* a week?—I think the widow will get 7*s.* and 2*s.* for the eldest child, and 1*s.* each for the three others.

2341. When a child reaches the age of 16 the allowance to the mother terminates?—No; the allowance to the children, the girls at 16 and the boys at 14.

2342. I observe that your table of allowances is made, of course, in the form of payment to the widow calculated upon the number of children she has?—Yes.

2343. And that while, as the children reach the age that you have named, the calculation for them is struck off, the allowance to the widow remains?—Yes.

2344. Do you increase the allowance to the widow on her own account when she attains a particular age?—No, the committee make no distinction of age; it would make invidious exceptions, and the fund would not bear anything extra.

2345. But you are aware that the Patriotic Fund Commissioners increase the allowance when the age of 60 is attained, and they again increase it when the age of 70 is attained?—I was not aware of that.

2346. It has not been considered by the committee of your fund that such increase in the allowance is expedient?—No, they make no extra allowance in the case of illness or age. Of course, all these widows are now elderly.

2347. In determining the allocation of your fund, naturally, I suppose, in the first case you acquaint yourselves as to how generous an allowance the fund itself would bear?—Yes, at the outset, and since, as aforesaid, by additional grants when there was a surplus to bear it.

2348. Have you had any actuarial advice upon that point from time to time?—Yes, frequently; the last in 1889, when it was shown that the funds in hand were ample to continue all existing allowances.

2349. And your fund is calculated so that upon the actuarial opinion given you, it shall be capable of fulfilling the expectations you have given until the last survivor disappears?—Quite so. The last actuarial calculation was about five years ago; it was made by a Mr. Whitaker, who is now dead. He was the actuary to one of the large London insurance companies, and in 1885 he showed us that there was a surplus, and out of that surplus the committee were allowed by the Court of Chancery (I ought to have mentioned possibly beforehand that the fund has been in Chancery this last 18 years), on the recommendation of the committee to dispose of 3,000*l.*, 2,500*l.* of which was given to the Royal School for Officers' Daughters at Bath, and 500*l.* to the Royal Cambridge Asylum for Soldiers' Widows, as being cognate institutions.

2350. Did the contributions to those funds entitle you to any special privileges in the way of recommendations?—Votes.

2351. Were the privileges accorded to your Committee calculated as an equivalent for the amount contributed?—I cannot say; I presume so.

2352. It did not enter into the determination of the amount?—It was given to them as an evident surplus, and the committee never had it in their minds to create what may be called a tontine fund, or a large surplus. From the very first they always had the view before them of bringing the fund to a close with the last pensioner.

2353. It has not been contemplated that the fund should retain a surplus as a nucleus for any subsequent wars of the same kind?—No.

2354. You have already stated that awards are calculated on the assumption that with the disappearance of the last person having a claim upon it the fund will have been exhausted?—Practically.

2355. Is there any other point to which you would like to call attention in regard to the administration of the fund?—I should like to show you that the charge of the fund now is simply under the direction of the Court of Chancery (handing in a document), the Commissioners simply administering the income.

2356. How far do you keep yourselves in communication with the Patriotic Commissioners, for example?—We have nothing to do with them. In connection with the document I last handed in, that is a copy of the last return I made to the Court of Chancery (handing in the same).

2357. But you are aware that the widows and orphans whom you relieve, the orphans particularly, are entitled to assistance from the Patriotic Fund Commissioners?—I am not aware of that.

2358. Do you take no pains in making your awards to ascertain, by direct communication with the Patriotic Fund Commissioners, whether they also are extending benefits to the same applicants?—No, I cannot say that we do or ever have done. We understood that they were for the Crimea; and this is an Indian Mutiny Fund specially. We frequently get them sent on to us.

Lord Edmund Talbot.

2359. Where from?—From the Patriotic Fund Commissioners. They apply there. At the outset these people as widows of men whom we knew to have been killed, by a reference to the War Office, in the Mutiny, were in England and were identified as the people they professed to be, were admitted upon our fund then and there; and most of them are on still.

Fund Commissioners up to the present time are limited to those whose husbands died of wounds or in consequence of casualties contracted in the Russian War?—Yes.

2361. But the Patriotic Fund, by subsequent deeds and Acts of Parliament, has been made available for children of soldiers who may have lost their lives in battle in any other war, or who may hereafter lose their lives in the service of the Crown; and, therefore, the children whom you are aiding might be entitled to benefit from the Patriotic Fund?—Possibly, but I am not aware of it.

2362. Do you deal with orphans whose mothers are not living?—Yes; I was just going to say that we have but five children of soldiers on the fund now, and they are five orphans; one is insane, one is blind, another is a cripple, and I cannot exactly say what the other two are; there are but five children on the fund of that class now.

2363. Perhaps, then, we may take it that children who would be claimants on the Patriotic Fund under the conditions that I have called attention to, have now grown beyond the age at which they are entitled to assistance?—Yes, all our boys were sent out at 14; girls at 16.

2364. But, I think you stated at an earlier stage that you made investigations into the circumstances and into the other sources of income as well as into the general character of all those to whom your relief is extended?—Yes.

2365. And that in the case of misconduct or discreditable life, the recipients are struck off the list?—Yes, they are. All our pay is disbursed to the soldiers' widows, either through some military pay office or through some clergyman. There are certain questions, as I said just now, which are sent out each quarter to, and answered by, the clergyman, and attested by his signature; and on that the payments are made. One of the questions is, "Is this widow in any way disqualified from continuance of the relief."

2366. Who are the persons on whose report you rely in such cases?—Either the Military Paymaster or the clergyman who pays each individual widow.

2367. In disbursing the relief, I think you have stated that you require a statement, on the occasion of every payment, as to whether the recipient is of a character which entitles her to the benefit of the grant?—Yes.

2368. And therefore you are kept continuously informed as to the circumstances of each recipient?—Each quarter.

2369. I suppose you would claim that your method of operations enables you to obtain from the money at your disposal the largest benefit that could be anticipated?—I think so.

2370. You have stated that the expenditure last year was 5,649*l.* 14*s.* 10*d.*?—Yes.

2371. The secretary draws an annual salary of how much?—£300.

2372. What other expenses are incurred?—There is the rent of the offices, 55*l.*, sundry law costs incidental to Chancery, and the small office expenses.

2373. Can you tell us what percentage upon the amount expended is incurred in the administration?—I think you have the total there; it is 27,000*l.*; about 4¾ per cent.

2374. I would rather take it for any year; for example, last year the expenditure was 5,649*l.* 14*s.* 10*d.*?—Yes.

2375. That is the year's expenditure, not only including the allowances made to the beneficiaries, but also the cost of management?—Yes.

2376. Can you tell us how much of that was expended in management during the year, approximately?—£. 448 8*s.* 4*d.*, including salaries, rent, and everything.

2377. Postage and all that?—Yes.

2378. Then the whole expense of administering your fund, diminished as it is now in volume, is not more than about 7 per cent.?—Is it so much as that?

2379. Observing the aggregate figures which you put in of disbursements extending over the 27 years, an honourable Member says it works out to something less than 5 per cent.?—Yes.

Mr. Kearley.

2380. It has cost you 23,000*l.*, roughly, to disburse 516,000*l.*?—Yes, I did not think it was 7 per cent.; it may be in one particular year, but it would hardly be a just conclusion to put the 7 per cent. on the year, whereas on the whole aggregate it is so much less.

Chairman.

2381. We take it that while your staff, such as it is, has to continue, with the diminished volume of funds you have to distribute, your percentage of expense must necessarily be a little larger?—Yes, possibly.

2382. Do not suppose for a moment that I am reflecting upon it as extravagant?—No.

2383. Would it be convenient for you to make up this statement to the present time and to put it in with your evidence?—I could do it next week.

2384. Yes; I am speaking now of the general aggregate statement?—Yes, quite so; I will carry it on up to the end of 1894, and send it.

2385. In the case of the children who are under your charge, you provide in certain cases for their education?—We did so long as they were children, but there are none on the fund now; it is 37 years ago, and we have a few young ladies on the fund, that is all, no boys.

2386. As regards the young ladies on the fund, who are the daughters, I suppose, of soldiers, are they retained after the age of 16 when from any infirmity they are incapable of earning a livelihood?—Certainly; amongst those are the five orphans I mentioned who are, one blind and another paralysed, and so on, but these are orphans of soldiers; we still have a few ladies on the fund, orphans of officers and others, not suffering from any infirmity.

2387. There the rule which terminates the charity at 16 is relaxed?—Yes.

2388. And no limitation of age is imposed at all?—No.

2389. From the experience that you have had you must have been aware of the existence of certain other funds raised in India for similar objects to that for which this particular fund was raised?—Not in connection with the Mutiny, not to my knowledge.

2390. Do you know anything about Lady Roberts'

Chairman—continued.

Roberts' fund?—There was a large sum remitted from this fund at the outset to India, amounting to 140,000*l.*, which was administered there by local committees. There was a fund called the Punjaub Fund, and Bombay, Calcutta Funds.

2391. For instance, there was the Afghan War Fund?—That has nothing to do with us, nor we with them.

2392. Was there no danger of those who are receiving assistance from the Bombay Military Relief Fund, the Afghan War Fund, Lady Roberts' Fund, and other charities of that kind, conflicting with and overlapping yours?—I think not. During the Mutiny there were certain local funds raised; there was the one that you mentioned, Afghan War Fund, having no connection with us, the Bombay Relief Fund, and there was the Punjaub Fund; but there is nothing in connection with the Indian Mutiny Fund. But all those names are upon my books in London here; the names of the sufferers who were relieved by them from London are upon my books in London here, so that they are not paid twice over.

2393. You take pains to keep yourselves informed as to what was being done by other funds of a more or less similar character?—Yes; for instance, I may read out from my book here a list of remittances to India; these were also at the outset of the fund. There was 87,787*l.* 14*s.* 2*d.* remitted to Calcutta; to Bombay, 20,619*l.* 2*s.* 10*d.*; to Lahore, 12,000*l.*; to Oude, 5,178*l.* 9*s.* 1*d.*; to Delhi, 5,344*l.* 14*s.* 4*d.*; to the Lawrance Asylum, 10,000*l.*; and to Agra, 10,356*l.* 18*s.* 2*d.*

2394. In what year were those sums remitted?—Up to the year 1866; they were at the outset, altogether in the first few years. We still pay 400*l.* per annum to India.

2395. These were funds sent out for the benefit of those continuing to reside in India?—They were grants sent out for the immediate relief of sufferers there. The suffering was, as you know, very great.

2396. As they returned to England the administration of the relief was transferred from the Indian authorities to your correspondents at home?—Yes.

2397. Is there anything you would like to say further?—I may say that these grants were not in the way of allowances; they were all grants for the immediate relief of sufferers in India at the time.

2398. The first aim was to give relief in the form of gratuities and grants; your subsequent policy has been rather to give something in the form of continuous allowances?—Yes, permanent allowances.

Mr. Kearley.

2399. What threw this fund of yours into Chancery?—The application of the committee. It was originally a trust fund; the trustees were Mr. Alderman Finnis, who was Lord Mayor in 1857, Mr. Thomas Hankey, governor of the Bank of England, Mr. Phillip Cazenove, a broker in the City, and General Tremenheere, R.E.; they were the four trustees. After a period of years these gentlemen were getting old, and they wished to divest themselves of the trust. We first applied to the Charity Commissioners, and they would have taken the whole fund over and taken all responsibility out of the committee's hands, and the management also; but the committee did not wish that, so they applied to the Court of Chancery for permission to pay the whole fund into Court to the credit of the Paymaster General, the committee still remaining as the committee to administer the income. It was on their own application. I will send a copy of the application up to you if you like.

2400. It was a voluntary action?—Yes. I got these documents yesterday from the solicitors rather hurriedly; they are their own private copies (handing in some papers). That shows that the fund was put into Chancery at the request of the trustees, and that they were not forced to do it.

2401. That is what I wanted to know?—It was of their own wish and will.

2402. Has the Court of Chancery exercised any supervision over the administration, or are they merely custodians of the fund?—I send in every year a Return of that nature (handing in a Return), giving the name of every recipient of the fund.

2403. Making a full discovery of what you are doing with the money?—Yes; and each of those payments is vouched by a receipt, and initialled in Mr. Justice Chitty's rooms.

2404. Has the Court of Chancery ever questioned any of your payments. I do not mean as regards the genuineness, but as regards the advisability of the amount, or anything like that?—No. Once or twice there has been a query upon it, as they call it, and it has been referred to the Attorney General, but it has always been passed.

2405. Then they are exercising something more than mere nominal supervision?—Most perfect supervision. This (handing in a document) is the 18th account; this, after being vouched, is copied into the book called the Court of Chancery Book, which I have to swear to, and then they pass it, and this account is kept in the Court of Chancery. I keep my copy.

2406. I see that last year your income was 1,860*l.* and your expenditure 5,649*l.*?—Yes.

2407. So that you evidently go in for the policy of exhausting your fund for the benefit of those for whom it was originally subscribed?—Yes.

2408. Has that always been the policy?—Yes, always.

2409. And speaking, as I suppose you can, as a gentleman having large experience, do you consider that that is the proper way to administer a fund that is subscribed for a particular object and purpose?—I am only the servant of the committee, and they have made the rules; but it does appear to me, if you ask me the question, that to give the highest possible annual grant to each person on the fund is desirable, instead of keeping a large surplus to be made ducks and drakes of, possibly, by-and-bye by somebody else. That is, however, only my own private opinion.

2410. You have now on the fund 223 beneficiaries?—Yes.

2411. And you hope they will exhaust the balance

Mr. Kearley—continued.

balance in hand of 46,000*l.*?—It is expected that they will approximately.

2412. You do not expect it to balance exactly?—No.

2413. May I ask whether you anticipate any large surplus accruing?—I doubt if there will be a large surplus; but I may say, that I know that the desire of the committee would be, in the event of any surplus accruing, to apply to the court before the final winding-up of the fund, that it might be applied in the same way as the 3,000*l.* that I have already mentioned has been applied.

2414. By increasing the grants?—No; because all the persons will be supposed to be off then, but by giving any possible surplus then existing to such institutions as the School for Officers' Daughters at Bath, the Royal Cambridge Asylum, or any other institution of a like nature, meant for soldiers' widows or orphans.

2415. Who are the committee managing this fund?—They have been changed a great many times. General Tremenheere, Dr. Grant, H. D. Sandeman, Esq., General Dodgson, C.B., George Finnis, Esq., General Cave, General Holroyd, General Murray, General Baker, Dr. Cockburn, and J. Berry White, Esq.

2416. How are these gentlemen appointed?—By the Court on application; we have authority now, whenever the committee are reduced to six, to appeal to the Court for new members.

2417. That is to say, when vacancies arise through death or retirement, the Court makes additional appointments?—Upon the recommendation of the committee, generally men who have been in India and connected with the fund there, or friends of the present committee, are asked to join.

2418. Was there any trust deed governing the administration of this fund at the outset?—I have never seen one.

Mr. Kearley—continued.

2419. The committee exercise a discretion?—It was simply vested in their names. I may say that I think there was not a trust deed, as the money was simply vested in their names at the Bank of England; there may have been, I know not.

2420. Let me ask you this question: Is the Committee bound down by any hard or fast regulations as to the administration of this fund, or does it exercise a latitude of discretion?—We cannot go beyond the rules; and there are no other rules than I have already explained to bind the committee. If they see a distinctly deserving case, say, an application from some woman who has suffered very much in India during the Mutiny and she has lost money there, they may even at this day give her a grant of 100*l.* or 200*l.* if they think it needful.

2421. Then they have discretion?—Yes; then the order goes before the Court of Chancery each year, and the Court of Chancery may object to it; but as a fait accompli they probably would not ask the committee to refund the money.

2422. Have you been in the Army yourself?—Yes, I was all through the Mutiny with General Havelock.

2423. Do you mind my asking, are you in receipt of a pension for services?—I am, from the India Office.

2424. Are you in expectation of receiving a pension from this fund at any time?—That is beyond my power to answer.

2425. It is no part of your contract?—Oh dear, no.

2426. You have no contract?—Not at all.

2427. Can you tell me whether any of those who have been in the service of this fund have received a pension on retirement?—None at all. The former secretary retired in 1863, and I have been secretary since 1863 myself.

Lieut.-Colonel THOMAS TULLY, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

2428. YOU are, I believe, secretary of the Royal Military Tournament?—I am.

2429. And you are also honorary secretary of the Imperial War Fund?—I am.

2430. You are aware of the terms of the reference to this Committee?—I am.

2431. Are you able to give us some information with regard to the fund subscribed after the campaign in Egypt?—Yes.

2432. In what year was that?—The first meeting was held on the 23rd of October 1882, a formal meeting.

2433. A reference is made in the general statement you have put before us to a military tournament given by Lieutenant-General Taylor at West Drayton Hall?—Yes; he was then Adjutant-General during Lord Wolseley's absence in Egypt; and his wife, Lady Jane Taylor, gave a tournament there, which was very successful. That was the beginning of the idea.

2434. The balance of the receipts from that tournament amounted to 616*l.*, I think?—That is so.

Chairman—continued.

2435. Did that sum become the nucleus of a larger fund?—Yes, it did.

2436. Are you able to say what amount was received altogether?—I think I must divide it into two parts. There were two applications to the public for subscriptions, one for the first Egyptian War, and the second for the Eastern Soudan War, if I may so call it.

2437. I see on one of the forms you have put in there is the title "The Imperial War Fund"?—Yes.

2438. Was that fund intended to comprehend the two campaigns to which you refer?—Yes, and all future campaigns.

2439. The idea was to found a permanent fund?—A permanent war fund.

2440. Available for all classes of persons who had been injured in any campaign?—Any campaign.

2441. Should I be right in saying, for whom provision had not already been made by some other fund?—Undoubtedly; we took pains to inform ourselves on that point.

2442. Perhaps

Chairman—continued.

2442. Perhaps you will just, in answer to the question, state what were the principles of the application of the fund laid down by those who made the appeal to the public for subscriptions?—At that time the Government did not give a pension to the wives and families of soldiers who died of disease or wounds on active service; they gave them a year's pay and there it ended. In the case of a man who died from disease, if my memory is correct, the widow got nothing.

Lord Edmund Talbot.

2443. Not even the year's pay?—Yes. I am going back 10 years, but I think I am correct in that. This fund was intended to afford temporary relief, that is to say, immediately, not to wait for more forms than was necessary; and that was invariably done through the officer commanding the regiment or battalion, or the military chief immediately above persons who died and who would know all about them. Then the second object was to afford permanent assistance to the families of the killed or disabled men by either direct aid or grants of money to institutions already in existence having such object in view. As an example we set up at that time a good many invalided men in business, a man who had lost a leg or an arm, for instance. One particular case was rather a hard case of a non-commissioned officer who was just going to get his commission in the Royal Artillery. He lost a leg in Egypt, and we bought a post-office for him in Birmingham, I think, and paid 40*l.* and established him for the rest of his life. It was rather a hardship his just losing his commission by that wound. The committee took large discretionary powers to do what they thought best in every individual case.

2444. What was the amount which was given in response to the appeal?—I have some figures here, but not exactly an answer to your question. The total amount distributed by the Imperial War Fund from its foundation down to now has been nearly 7,000*l.*

2445. Does the fund still continue?—I propose to put in last year's balance sheet (handing in the same).

2446. The balance sheet which you have just put in represents that you have invested, and in hand, a capital of 5,212*l.*?—The amount at present is 5,212*l.*

2447. That includes dividends which have been received during the year?—Naturally.

2448. And your expenditure out of that fund during the year in the way of relief, was how much?—£56. I may here explain that since a large sum was handed over out of the Soldiers' Effects Fund to the Patriotic Fund, the claims on our fund have practically disappeared.

2449. Then, perhaps, I had better bring you up to that. Up to the time of the transfer by the War Office to the Patriotic Fund of a sum from unclaimed soldiers' effects there were a large number of sufferers by the wars, who received no kind of public assistance at all?—Yes.

2450. And you have already explained to the Committee that it was to meet those cases that your funds were formed?—Yes.

2451. In the first place, the Egyptian War

Lord Edmund Talbot—continued.

Fund, and that, am I to understand, was merged in what was called the Imperial War Fund?—The Egyptian War was over; so the trustees took power to deal with other wars than the Egyptian, and the fund was called the Imperial War Fund.

2452. And under the title of the Imperial War Fund your operations are still carried on?—To a limited extent. We are ready for another war.

2453. How many recipients have you upon the fund at the present time?—Five. I will put in this document, if you like, which shows the amount of money distributed up to the 31st of December 1883, which was the first year (handing in the same).

2454. You have submitted to the Committee a statement of the claims admitted, and payments made from the formation of the fund up to the 31st of December 1883?—Yes; that was the first and the worst year.

2455. That is practically within one year?—At the end you will find the totals added up. That shows the class of applicant and what was done in each case.

2456. During that year you relieved 96 widows, 27 relatives, and 237 invalids; in all, a grand total of 360?—That would be so.

2457. At the present time, however, the number of claimants upon your fund is small, and that is attributable to the creation of the Soldiers' Effects Fund, as administered by the Patriotic Fund Commissioners?—Undoubtedly. These cases which we now deal with are cases that are not dealt with and cannot be dealt with by that fund.

2458. Do you think it is worth while to keep your fund alive for so small a range of benefits?—It does not cost much.

2459. What does it cost?—Nine shillings a week; 25*l.* a year covers everything.

2460. Including the whole cost of administration?—Yes.

2461. Including the handsome salary you draw yourself?—Yes.

Mr. Kearley.

2462. That is to administer an expenditure of how much?—£56. That question of percentage is misleading. You could administer that pay to five widows very likely for a sovereign in the year; but you must have a local habitation, an office, and a name and address, and you must see that the dividends are collected; and somebody must look after all that. There is always a danger if a fund is not looked after that it may disappear.

Chairman.

2463. Has it not occurred to you that it might be worth while to ask the Patriotic Fund Commissioners to accept the responsibility of your disbursements?—That is the very last thing that would occur to me.

2464. Will you tell me why? One of the points that we have to consider is the view held by some, that concentration and consolidation of these various funds under one management would be beneficial?—I think that one of the first principles of the administration of a charitable fund is a little sympathy.

2465. Giving assistance by a sympathetic hand and personal communication?—Yes.

2466. And you think that you have been able to insure that in a larger degree than would be the case by a board of commissioners?—I think so. I can go further than that and put in an extract from the "Daily Chronicle" of 4th May 1883 (handing in the same). You will see the paragraph marked, there, with reference to that very question of the Patriotic Fund at our meeting, when the question of the trust deed and so forth was considered.

2467. These quotations from the papers merely indicate that it was stated in your Report in 1883 that the consolidation of these funds would not be advantageous?—I may state that there was a very strong feeling at that meeting against this fund or any balance being handed over to the Patriotic Fund Commissioners. It was an expression of opinion.

2468. And the opinion expressed at that meeting is shared by you?—Undoubtedly.

2470. Then I go back to the origin of the fund, and to those who participated in it in such large numbers. In what form was the assistance given generally, in gratuities, or in continuous payments?—The difficulty that a poor woman, the wife or widow of a soldier or sailor, was left in, was that she wanted money at once; the pay-note in the Navy was stopped, or the pay in the Army. I venture to submit that in this fund then (as would happen again in case of war breaking out) the relief would be instantaneous.

Lord Edmund Talbot.

2471. After the death?—Yes, naturally. The moment the death was known, by the promptest means known to modern science, the commanding officer, or some responsible person, such as a clergyman, would be communicated with and immediate relief would be given.

2472. Do you recognise the claims of seamen as well as soldiers?—Yes; you will see in that list a great many claims from the relatives of seamen.

2473. And grants were generally made in the shape of pensions for a limited period?—Yes, at that time; but there was a little storm in Parliament about it; the question was raised in the House of Commons. We did give pensions then for periods, but as the pension from the Patriotic Fund came into operation naturally ours ceased.

2474. Were the grants made graded according to rank?—That was the principle; they were graded according to rank.

2475. The widow of a private soldier drew 3*s.* 6*d.* a week, and of a colour-sergeant, 5*s.*?—That is correct.

2476. And to those allowances for the widows

Lord Edmund Talbot—continued.

1*s.* 6*d.* a week was added for each child?—Yes.

2477. But those grants were only made for the immediate and urgent necessity, and, that term completed, their claims were reconsidered?—Yes, each one.

2478. What has become of them during the last 13 years; have they dropped out of sight, those who benefited?—I frequently get letters, and we sometimes give a little help in exceptional cases; but all those cases you speak of have, in the way you put it, dropped out of sight; they have been dealt with by the State in some way.

2479. I suppose we may take it that the larger proportion of them are benefited from the Soldiers' Effects Fund?—Undoubtedly.

2480. In what respect is the Soldiers' Effects Fund insufficient for meeting the cases which you regard as properly devolving upon your organisation?—There are only five beneficiaries from our fund at the present moment, as I explained.

2481. But pardon me; I am rather looking forward to a future war. You are keeping yourselves alive and reserving your resources in order to meet the occurrence of another demand similar to that which called you into existence before?—Yes.

2482. What kind of cases do you anticipate will make claims upon you which will not be met from the Soldiers' Effects Fund?—Let me assume that the 10th Hussars are ordered to any part of the world you like at 24 hours' war notice. There are a number of married men in that regiment, and their little homes in barracks are broken up at once. We should immediately send to the officer commanding that regiment a sufficient sum of money to prevent any of the women and children of the married men of that regiment being losers by the sudden movement of that regiment on war service.

2483. Do you know of the existence of a society called the Soldiers' and Sailors' Families Association, administered by Colonel Gildea?—Yes.

2484. Who seems to draw about as much for his services as you get for yours?—Precisely, I should think about the same.

2485. Is it not the particular province of that association also to do the work that you have just described?—I think that, as in recent administrative matters of State, concentration is not always an advantage, even in military matters.

2486. But you have spoken of a regiment being suddenly ordered abroad and a certain number of wives and children being left at home; and you say that you would instantly come to the assistance of those families?—We have done so, and doubtless should again.

2487. What I asked you was, is not that one of the principal functions which has been undertaken by the Soldiers' and Sailors' Family Association?—It has copied us, I believe, in certain respects.

2488. Is there not then rather a danger in this amiable conflict between two societies of the evil which is so constantly referred to, and which we all all understand when we speak of overlapping?—Academically speaking, yes.

2489. Do you put yourselves into friendly communication so as to avoid that overlapping?—I should do that with the officer commanding the regiment.

2490. Would he also be appealed to by the other association?—I hope he would exercise that discretion which persons in authority always do in such cases.

2491. Supposing that the officer commanding the regiment has gone off with the troops himself, what would you do?—There is always a head left.

2492. But if I remember rightly, it was stated by Colonel Gildea that they had spread all over the country a network of organisation which undertook this work of dispensing the relief that they were able to place at their disposal?—There is this difference between Colonel Gildea's work and that of my fund, if I may call it so: that he attempts to grapple with a subject which we, I think prudently, have left alone. I think personally that his fund is rather a temptation to soldiers to marry without leave. It is an old subject, but we do not touch it. Although we do not refuse relief to a woman who has married without leave, whose husband is killed, we do not touch the family question in time of peace at all. Ours is a war fund exclusively; theirs, I think, deals with the peace aspect of it as well, which, of course, is a very valuable one, and is no doubt doing very good work. We do not think ourselves strong enough to deal with that.

2493. Perhaps I ought to have explained that, although it is very interesting to us to hear anything that can be told us of the care which is taken of the families of soldiers, still, the range of our inquiry is as to the widows, orphans, and dependent relatives of soldiers, sailors, and marines, who have actually lost their lives in the service of their country?—Quite so; therefore, we are in the same boat, if I may use the expression. I would here put in a document that I compiled myself ten years ago with a great deal of trouble (handing in the same), in which the various funds which exist are mentioned.

2494. You have made yourself acquainted with all the naval and military funds available for the service of soldiers and their families?—Yes. My own fund has not been actively engaged lately, but I am generally speaking, fairly acquainted with the several funds and their principles of distribution.

2495. And you have taken the trouble to compile a return, or paper, showing the name and objects and financial position of all the funds which you have been able to get cognisance of?—Yes, which I could get at the time. It was very troublesome, I admit.

2496. You have told us a great deal about what you do for families of men who are still living in the Service; but now will you tell us what is the general character of the assistance you give, or are prepared to give, in the case of widows, orphans, and dependent relatives?—Of course, the conditions are slightly different now, because a widow at the present moment is entitled to a certain pension, but there are delays in getting that money.

2497. Then you think it would be an important duty that you should be prepared to undertake to seek out cases of need and afford instantaneous relief?—Instantaneous relief.

2498. What particular method would you follow in arriving at a knowledge of the cases requiring relief?—I read the Army List, and I know the movements of the troops; I am in close touch with the Army through the Military Tournament, of which I am secretary, and I know Army movements pretty well. I should know if even a company of the Ordnance Store corps were moved on foreign service, and I should communicate with the officer commanding it.

2499. Then from your military knowledge and familiarity with Army organisation, you know exactly how to get at what you regard as the best advice as to the manner in which your assistance is required?—I think so.

2500. Is there anything further you would like to say to us?—Only that I have prepared a précis of the trust deed, which I shall have great pleasure in handing in.

2501. How was that trust deed arrived at?—By a meeting, convened by advertisement, of subscribers and the committee; a large meeting.

2502. At the original inception of the fund?—Yes.

2503. Has it undergone any change since?—No.

2504. It is, then, the legal instrument under which your funds are held and the work is carried on?—Yes; I can show it you, and you can look at the signatures of the trust deed, and you can recognise some of them (handing in the same).

2505. It appears that you are under the patronage of Her Majesty the Queen, H.R.H. the Duke of Cambridge, and others?—Yes; and Her Majesty gave 150*l.*

2506. And I find among the signatories to the trust deed are such well-known persons as Lord Wemyss, Lord Wolseley, and others distinguished in the Services?—Yes.

2507. Do they take any personal concern in the administration of the fund?—I see that they do. I sent out, on receipt of the summons from this Committee, a notice to all of them that I would attend here to-day, and I sent each of them the balance-sheet and information up to date, so that they might, if they thought fit, write to me or say anything; but I have received no communication.

2508. But the character of your work does not necessitate their being called together from time to time at present?—The treasurer is Mr. Frederick Cox, of Messrs. Cox & Co., and I consult him about everything that is done in connection with the fund.

2509. That is the well-known firm of Army agents and bankers?—Yes.

2510. Practically, your fund is lying idle except in time of war?—Yes.

2511. And at the present moment you are spending 56*l.* a year?—In relief. I should like to explain those cases once more. One, for instance, was the mother of a man in the 1st Battalion South Staffordshire Regiment, who died at Alexandria of dysentery, and who allowed his mother 1*l.* a month out of his pay. I do not think there is any military fund that could deal with that, that could recoup her for that or put her on any pension list. We pay that 1*l.* a month to her.

Chairman.

2512. She would be entitled to assistance from the Soldiers' Effects Fund, would she not?—Not in the case of a man who out of his pay allowed his mother 1*l.* a month, I think.

Mr. Kearley.

2513. If it could be proved that she was absolutely dependent upon that 1*l.* a month, the Soldiers' Effects Fund would meet it; but if he was allowing it to her simply as an act of liberality, and she had an income beyond that, it would not?—I take the precaution every quarter of getting a certificate from the clergyman of the parish that So-and-so is a respectable and meritorious person, and in need of financial assistance, and is recommended for assistance.

Lord Edmund Talbot.

2514. How long, on the average, was anybody that you gave relief to in getting it, from the time of the death of the husband we will say?—That is rather difficult for me to say now, but practically she gets it as quickly as possible.

2515. One of your objections to the Patriotic Fund, I think, is delay?—Yes.

2516. Cannot you give us any information as to the extent to which you are able to compete with them on that point?—I will give you one case. I think it was the Dorset Regiment (I will not swear to that) that was ordered from Chatham to Malta at a few hours' notice. I sent a telegram to the officer commanding, and I sent 30*l.* down by special messenger in gold to help the women and children, and so forth, to make their little arrangements to get out of barracks. They had to go off at once, as they must do sometimes.

2517. I do not mean a case of that kind; I mean a case during war, when immediate relief is required for the widow; how soon would she get it?—As fast as that certificate could be filled up and sent to me a cheque would be sent to the clergyman of the district.

2518. As a matter of fact, you have not worked that out?—It would be by return of post. The moment that form is filled up and signed by an officer of the Army, a magistrate, or a clergyman, the cheque would go back by return of post.

2519. Do you take any steps to investigate as to the continued good character of those whom you assist?—Yes; each quarterly payment of the limited number I have to make is countersigned by the clergyman of the parish or an officer of the Army or the Navy or a magistrate, as to the merits of the applicant.

Chairman.

2520. May I just interpose a question, as you referred to the clergyman of the parish. There is no intention on your part, I presume, to limit your aid to those professing any particular form of religious belief?—No, I myself am a Roman Catholic. We do not know either politics or religion in the administration of the fund.

2521. You would take the certificate of the clergyman or minister of any denomination?—Yes; any respectable person.

Chairman—continued.

2522. I am not quite clear to what extent your objections to the Patriotic Fund at the present moment go?—Pray do not take me as objecting to anything. You asked me where were the advantages of this fund, and I put it in a different way

2523. You give us no evidence in support of your being quicker in relief?—It is difficult to prove a negative; but I should doubt very much whether you would get money out of the Patriotic Fund with our speed, even if they could deal with all those cases. How would the moving of a serjeant major, out of his rooms in barracks, and the expense that he is put to in moving his furniture, be dealt with by the Patriotic Fund?

2524. That is quite a different thing?—I think we should be quicker.

2525. In the case of a regiment moving, do you give assistance to the women off the strength, or do you limit it to those that are on the strength; have you any rule about that?—That is left to the officer commanding the regiment.

2526. You do not go into the question?—No; not in that case. We give 10*l.* to the widow of a man who is killed; we have power to give up to 10*l.* at once.

2527. Whether on the strength or off it?—Whether on the strength or off it, and 1*l.* to each child. That is an immediate grant.

2528. You do not distinguish between the two?—We would not discuss that in any way.

Mr. Kearley.

2529. How long did it take before you gave relief to these naval beneficiaries that are set out in this list?—It would be with the same speed, so far as practicable.

2530. How long did it take you from the time of commencing?—I have said before that, as soon as the form was filled up, a cheque was written and sent. The delay would not be at my end.

2531. Can you tell the Committee whether it occupied a month or two?—It would occupy about 12 hours after the form reached my office; it would go back by return.

2532. Have you made, or would you make, any enquiries at the Admiralty?—Yes; I have volumes of correspondence with the Admiralty.

2533. Would you get that through in 12 hours?—No. Pardon me; you asked me whether I made inquiries at the Admiralty. As to what? As to a particular case?

2534. Yes?—Not necessarily in each particular case. If I had the certificate of the commander of a ship, or the chaplain at Haslar, or an Admiralty official at Portsmouth,

Mr. Kearley—continued.

I should send the money straight to him without further reference to the Admiralty. As a matter of fact we did open a Portsmouth branch, and at the end of a certain time the balance was returned to us. We sent a lump sum to Chief Paymaster Southern District at Portsmouth, and at the end of the period he returned the balance that was unused.

2535. You would not stay your hand for fear that some of these beneficiaries might be getting too much?—I do not think that would be a vital defect.

2536. You do not think there is much danger of beneficiaries becoming enriched by some disaster to the husbands?—No beneficiary could be very much enriched by the maximum of 10*l.* that we begin with.

2537. Has it ever occurred to you to postpone the payment because the beneficiary had money coming from another source?—I frequently waited and made fresh inquiries.

2538. But what I want to get at is, whether you have postponed the payment, having admitted the entitlement of the beneficiary to it, to some future date because you happen to know that for the present the wants of the woman were supplied?—If I found that a person was not in immediate want of assistance, I should certainly postpone it. There is no title to relief created by our trust deed at all.

2539. And you would give notice that you were going to make some allowance; you would admit your generous intentions, but you would delay the handing over of the money until the woman had spent what she might have in hand from other sources?—Yes, I do not think it is a wise thing to hurl money at poor people; it leads to extravagance and waste, undoubtedly.

2540. Now, by your trust deed, you have power, I see, to apply any surplus to the relief of families of men suffering in future campaigns?—Yes.

2541. And, further, the trustees themselves have power, by convening a special meeting, to alter the objects and administration and distribution of the trust funds, and also to alter the provisions of the trust, provided a supplementary deed be drawn accordingly?—Yes, if it was thought necessary and desirable. There is also a full power that, in the event of every trustee dying, there are certain official trustees who have power to come in, so that the funds should not be lost in any way. I think it is the Secretary of State for War, the Commander-in-Chief, and the Adjutant General, those three, who would officially, in the event of the extinction of the trustees altogether, have power to take it up.

2542. This trust deed gives you a great advantage over many of those that govern the administration of funds in the hands of the Patriotic Fund Commissioners?—We intended that it should.

2543. You have not to wait until you can get some Parliamentary assistance?—No.

2544. So that you are able to administer your funds in what I may term an up-to-date manner?—Quite so.

2545. Up to a certain time you were relieving certain people?—Yes.

2546. But you discontinued doing so in consequence of the Government having handed over to the Patriotic Fund Commissioners the Soldiers' Effects Fund?—Each case was looked into, and naturally we did not strike the pensioners off en bloc; but if those to whom we were sending relief, came under the provisions of the Patriotic Fund, and they became entitled to these pensions, naturally we would not pay them twice over, it would not be desirable.

2547. Had you many claimants on your fund that you could not satisfy in consequence of its not being large enough?—No, our fund was quite sufficient for our purposes. We could not have carried the pensions permanently; that was impossible; and I may say frankly that we deliberately set to work to create public feeling on the subject, which resulted, as you know, in the money being handed over to the Patriotic Fund Commissioners.

2548. Have you ever studied the present position of the Soldiers' Effects Fund?—The Soldiers' Effects belonged to the dead soldiers; they do not now belong to anybody.

2549. Have you studied its administration since it has been handed over to the Patriotic Fund Commissioners?—No.

2550. Could you give us an opinion as to whether in the natural course of events there would be a larger number of claimants on the fund now than when it was first handed over to the Patriotic Fund Commissioners?—That is rather a speculative question, I think.

2551. I understood you to say that you made a great study of these questions?—I have admitted that I have not looked at that particular fund.

2552. I noticed that in 1885 there were 101 widows and 192 orphans on the Soldiers' Effects Fund, and in 1886, 99 widows and 213 orphans; but in 1894 there were 62 widows and 102 orphans?—Yes, they would be gradually dying out.

2553. Yes, gradually dying out, although the surplus assets have been increasing year by year?—Naturally.

2554. Would that be a natural development of the fund?—Yes, I should think so.

2555. They would be dying off?—Yes, except that I believe the United States Pension List grows annually; but that is exceptional.

2556. That is not an English pension list?—No. It would be the natural course of things for it to gradually die out.

2557. I see you are not spending your income?—No.

2558. Is it your intention to continue to accumulate funds?—We do not see any harm in accumulating funds. I hope there will never be another war, but I believe wars are always possible.

2559. Then you are pursuing the policy of waiting for something to turn up to enable you to spend your funds?—Yes.

2560. Is that because you cannot find a sufficient number of eligible persons to whom you could administer relief at the present time?—I am afraid you have missed the word "temporary" relief, it is not permanent, except in special cases such as I have mentioned. In very rare cases it is permanent.

2561. I will

Mr. Kearley—continued.

2561. I will apply that question to temporary relief. Cannot you find a sufficient number of eligible persons to exhaust this income?—That is not the subject before us; our fund is to bridge over the period between the disaster and the time that the State does or should step in.

2562. I notice in one of your statements that you referred to a scheme of amalgamation that appeared to be on foot?—That is Mr. Cox's statement, not mine. Mr. Cox said that, I did not.

Chairman.

2563. That was merely a suggestion of something in the air?—Yes.

Mr. Kearley.

2564. It was referred to at one of your meetings?—Yes; the question was raised in a rather pointed way, whether there was any intention of handing our surplus over to the Patriotic Fund. This was dealt with, but in a diplomatic way, by stating that there was no intention of so doing, but that there were certain questions of the amalgamation of these funds in the air, and it would be considered at the proper time whenever it arose.

2565. Do not you consider that amalgamation would be a good thing if the administration could be assured as being satisfactory?—That depends upon which way you amalgamate, undoubtedly.

Mr. Kearley—continued.

2566. I am not suggesting that the Patriotic Fund Commission should be the concentrating point of all these funds, but that there should be some amalgamation, possibly under one of the Government Department's control?—From my own personal point of view I do not think that would be advisable in the case of this particular fund.

2567. You think it would be better for these funds to be separately administered?—I am asked to give evidence about my own fund.

2568. You consider that whatever may happen to any other fund, yours ought to stand singly under its present excellent administration?—I say so by reason of our special knowledge of the army, and for other reasons. At the same time concentration of administration should be more economical than division.

2569. And do away with the possibility of overlapping?—Do away with that possible evil of overlapping. But when it is proposed to make it exclusively a Government Department, with all deference to all Government Departments, there is a tendency to get too official, which in the case of a charitable fund is not to be desired.

2570. I am assuming that the administration would be a good administration, like that of the Greenwich Hospital Fund?—Granting good administration, concentration is good, undoubtedly.

Mr. JAMES MILLINGTON, called in; and Examined.

Chairman.

2571. YOU are, I believe, the Secretary of Lloyd's Patriotic Fund?—I am.

2572. How long have you held that office?—Since 1864; I was assistant secretary from 1859, so that I think I am the oldest secretary of a patriotic fund in the kingdom, as our fund is the oldest fund of the sort in the kingdom.

2573. Where are your offices?—At 14, Cornhill, County Chambers, Cornhill, just close to Lloyd's, just opposite the Royal Exchange, where Lloyd's is carried on.

2574. The situation giving you an opportunity of frequently consulting with Lloyd's as cases arise?—Yes.

2575. Lloyd's Patriotic Fund originated in the popular and patriotic feeling of the country during the war with France, I think?—In 1803. It is really an offshoot of Lloyd's; it was founded by Lloyd's, aided by subscriptions throughout the country.

2576. There had been a peace, had there not, preceding it?—It was the second outbreak of the war. After the peace of Amiens had been broken in 1803 the war began again, and then this fund was raised.

2577. It was raised, as you tell us, at a meeting of merchants and other subscribers to Lloyd's?—Yes.

2578. Did those who were competent to do so vote out of the funded property of Lloyd's a large sum towards the establishment of the fund?—Yes, they voted 20,000*l.* from their own funds; then at a subsequent period, in 1809, they voted 5,000*l.*, and then in 1812 they voted another 10,000*l.*; so that they voted 35,000*l.* in all out of their own invested funds. That was quite independent of their individual contributions.

Chairman—continued.

2579. Then the appeal for voluntary subscriptions was generously responded to?—Yes, it was very generously responded to.

2580. What was the aggregate amount that was subscribed within the years you have stated?—Between 1803 and 1815, or 1818, say, because something came in a little later than 1815, the subscriptions amounted to 430,000*l.* in round numbers.

2581. The intention of that fund was the application of it to the relief of widows, orphans, and dependent relatives of soldiers, seamen, and marines?—Yes, who were killed in action.

2582. Killed in action in the then war with France?—Yes.

2583. And of officers and men alike?—Yes.

2584. Wounded in action by the enemy?—Yes.

2585. And dying subsequently?—No, who were disabled by wounds.

2586. Then the relief was not limited merely to widows, the survivors?—No, the larger amount was given to the men who were wounded.

2587. Was there not a further proposal, and was there not a further application of the funds by way of rewards for bravery and personal merit?—Yes, there was; honorary rewards were given given in a great many instances in plate, and honorary swords, which are now very valuable, being very old.

2588. But that only continued over a limited range of time?—Yes.

2589. It ceased when?—The more serious calls upon the fund became too urgent to allow it to go on; I think it was stopped in 1809.

2590. From that time forward the grants were made on behalf of widows and orphans of men and in the shape of gratuities to officers and men who were seriously wounded?—Yes, who were actually disabled by wounds.

2591. What particular form did the grants take that were given to widows and orphans?—In the first times of the fund the widows received pensions, and widows have received pensions down to within 20 years, perhaps; but now the relief has taken a different form; it is given in the form of donations which are annually revised, that is, in the case of every recipient of a donation, the facts have to come up annually before the trustees, and they consider whether it is a case to be continued.

2592. And an annual donation does not commit those who have the management of the fund to its repetition?—No, although practically nearly all the donations are continued, because they are generally very hard cases in the beginning; they are given to people aged and infirm, and those cases, of course, do not tend to ameliorate as they get older.

2593. Is it not true that at a certain period in the history of the fund pensions were given to officers' widows for life, with a reversion to their children also for their lives?—Yes, that was done in the first two or three years of the fund.

2594. Are there still some survivors of that class?—I believe there is one survivor, the daughter of an officer. The pension was given to the widow of the officer with a reversion to the three children; she is the surviving child, and she has a third part of the pension that was given to her mother, which amounts to 6*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* a year.

2595. Although the fund originated in a desire to assist those who had suffered during the war with France, have its benefits been subsequently extended to those who had suffered from other wars?—Yes, it was made applicable to every war except the Indian Mutiny, which was supposed to be provided for by a special fund.

2596. At what date was it made so applicable?—In 1840, so far as I remember.

2597. Considerably anterior to the origin of the Patriotic Fund of the Crimean War?—Yes.

2598. And to what extent are your benefits conferred?—The men who were disabled by wounds received in action are entitled, as they always were, to a donation, which is very often of use to set them up in business; or, if they enter the Commissionaires, it gives the necessary security and purchases the uniform. It is a donation calculated upon the severity of the wound, and the length of the man's service, say from 5*l.* to 15*l.*, or in case of non-commissioned officers, it is sometimes a little higher.

2599. But supposing that a soldier who has served his 21 years, or a non-commissioned officer, is entitled to a pension, would his claim to assist ance from your fund be recognised?—No, not unless he had been disabled by wounds.

2600. But if he had been disabled by wounds, he would be entitled to a pension on that account?—Yes; and so he would, of course, if he had served 21 years.

2601. But the sums to which he is entitled from Government funds are augmented, discreetly of course, by your fund?—By a donation which is of use generally to perhaps get a man into some small business, or something of that kind.

2602. And it is given discriminatingly for a particular purpose?—That is what it is supposed to be intended for, to assist men at the time, and as a first start in civil life; but we do not insist upon their applying immediately, although we insist upon it being done within five years of a man's discharge.

2603. Although that does not come within the scope of our inquiry, it is very interesting to know it. But now will you tell us in what particular form you give assistance to the widow, orphans, and dependent relatives of the dead soldier?—The great assistance that we give is in the education of children; in fact, that is our principal business. At the present time we have 136 children in various schools on presentations that we have purchased at various times, beginning in 1806, when we practically rescued the Royal Naval Asylum, now the Greenwich Hospital School. We were the founders of that, and we have the privilege of putting as many boys as we like in that school. In fact, we could fill it up to the exclusion of the Admiralty contributions, but we use that power discreetly. We have about 80 boys there.

2604. Do you mean to say your nominations take precedence of all others?—Yes, ours take precedence of all others; ours have to go in first; and then they order from the Admiralty to fill up.

2605. In regard to children of parents professing a faith other than that of the Church of England, how are they distributed; Roman Catholic children, for instance, are they excluded from benefit?—Not at all. We never inquire anything about religion, we take no notice of that whatever.

2606. Do you not select a school suited to the particular faith in which the children have to be brought up?—I think at Greenwich Hospital School they have Roman Catholic chaplains, I suppose they would, but we have never had that question raised.

2607. We have had evidence bearing upon the management of Greenwich Hospital School, but I imagine that you place your children at other institutions than Greenwich?—Yes, there is the Orphan Asylum at Devonport, the Royal British Female Orphan Asylum for daughters of soldiers, seamen, and marines, and we have 30 girls there.

2608. Do you give money allowances for the maintenance of children who are not sent to school in the way you describe?—No.

2609. Then you confine yourselves to the maintenance and education of children in such schools as you may select as most suitable?—Yes. The giving of money allowances was adopted formerly, but it was found not to be a good thing.

2610. What do you do with regard to the widows?—The widow of a soldier, as a rule, is no worse off than she was when her husband was alive, because it is more often that the soldier's wife assists her husband than that the soldier assists his wife. A soldier has nothing to give, but the wife very often keeps him in little luxuries by her work, she washes, or something of that kind. The soldier has nothing, so that the soldier's widow is no worse off than she was when her husband was alive, with the exception of about six per cent. of the soldiers who marry with leave, and then their wives get assistance from the regiment.

2611. But you are aware of the system by which seamen serving abroad make allotments from the wages to which they are entitled, which are paid to the families through the Admiralty?—Yes.

2612. And I have before me a statement of the arrangements which are made under the authority of the War Office, by which soldiers may make provision for their wives at home?—Yes, if they are able to do so.

2613. But you would hold that it is only a comparatively small number of soldiers on service who are able to do anything for the assistance of their families while they are away from home?—Yes, I think that is so. But in such cases, if the widow can prove that she has been deprived of some help by the death of her husband, then she would be assisted by Lloyd's Patriotic Fund.

2614. What form would that assistance take?—It would take the form of a donation, and it might take the form of putting one child to school, which is a far better form, because it takes the child from surroundings which are, perhaps, not very good, and trains it up to earn its own living. That is the case with children put in the Girls' Orphan Asylums.

2615. Has it occurred to you to continue to the bereaved family the assistance in the same amount and form which they have been accustomed to receive through the system of allotments?—The widow of a soldier, beyond a donation, would only be assisted in a permanent way if she were incapable of earning her living, for instance, through old age or infirmity. There are such cases on the fund. Very many are daughters of soldiers who have outgrown the age for the compassionate allowance and outgrown the age of capability of earning their living; a great many of them have been governesses, and some have partially lost their sight; a great many of those poor creatures get cataract. Those receive a donation, and the cases come up annually and the donations are repeated, so that practically they are pensions. We have very hard cases of that kind; and I do not think there is any other fund that looks to them; I am not aware of any.

2616. I gather that in making grants and renewing grants you are careful to ascertain the necessitous circumstances of the applicants?—Most careful, and very difficult it is.

2617. And you safeguard yourselves as far as you possibly can against the grants so made being encouragements to idle habits or want of self-reliance?—Yes; practically no assistance is given, at least no permanent assistance, to widows who are able to work; because, after all, they are in just the same position as they were before, or nearly so; some of them may have got a little assistance from soldier-husbands, but not many.

2618. What number of widows are receiving continuous assistance from the fund?—In widows you would include relatives like these daughters I have spoken of, who have outlived the compassionate allowance.

2619. Yes; that is to say, widows and dependent relatives receiving continuous assistance?—There may be 60 or 70 possibly.

2620. And do the grants made to those persons vary according to their circumstances?—Yes, entirely.

2621. Within what range, what would be the minimum?—We range from 10*l.* to 26*l.*; the maximum given is 26*l.*, because it is supposed that a woman who has nothing at all can exist on 10*s.* a week; but some of them have something. Sometimes the Government is good enough to continue their compassionate allowance of 12*l.* a year beyond the age, on account of their infirmity; then they would get something less from us.

2622. What is the amount of income which is now available for distribution?—It is about 2,300*l.*

2623. And what is about the average annual expenditure?—The average annual expenditure exceeds the income this year by 130*l.* The last two or three years it has exceeded the income by a trifle.

2624. Did you state what was the capital now invested and standing to the credit of the fund?—In cash value the capital amounts to about 85,000*l.*; that is, reckoning at the present price; it is in various railway securities, and in consols.

2625. How frequently do you have your funds valued for the purposes of such information?—They are in the hands of the Charity Commissioners, and they are always practically the same, they never change; so that the only variation in value is, as the funds rise or fall. We only deal with the income as regards cash.

2626. How do you mean, in the hands of the Charity Commissioners. They are administered under a scheme?—Yes.

2627. Who are the administrators?—The administrators are trustees who are chosen subject to the sanction of the Charity Commissioners, and the majority of them are underwriters of Lloyd's; eight out of 11 are underwriters of Lloyd's; one is a banker, Mr. Smith, of Smith, Payne's; and another is Mr. Bosanquet, and the other trustee, who is not an underwriter of Lloyd's, is the Chairman, Mr. Charles Hampden Wigram, who was formerly a shipowner.

2628. Can you tell the Committee the date of the scheme under which you are now governed?—It is just 20 years ago now, 1875.

2629. The average income then, you say, is how much?—I should say 2,200*l.*, roughly.

2630. And

Chairman—continued.

2630. And your expenditure sometimes exceeds that?—Sometimes it slightly exceeds that.

2631. But, I suppose, you endeavour to keep your expenditure and income evenly balanced?—We should like to do so, but we never allow a hard case to go by for the sake of keeping the expenditure within the income.

2632. Has there been any misgiving at any time on the part of those charged with the administration of the fund as to the wisdom of keeping it permanently up to the strength at which it now stands?—I am not sure that I quite catch the drift of your question.

2633. The funds were originally subscribed for a specific purpose?—Yes.

2634. After that purpose had been accomplished and the war was over, and the beneficiaries diminished in number, it was determined to apply the same to fresh purposes as they might arise?—Yes.

2635. And you contemplate that it will be permanently available for such claims as may arise in the future?—Yes, we hope so.

2636. Has it ever been considered by those who have the management that it would be expedient to distribute the funds to such claimants as might be found, and to terminate its existence with the close of the campaigns with which it was particularly identified?—As a matter of fact, when the French War was finished the whole of the fund had been voted away and more than was raised had been voted away, but there were certain annuitants on the fund, and to provide for those annuitants the trustees had purchased long annuities. Those long annuities were the salvation of the fund. They were bought very cheap at that time, and although the annuitants died off the annuities did not. We had 3,500 long annuities for 50 years, for that we gave 57,000*l.*; that paid us very well. The accumulation of those annuities are practically what the fund is now, or what the fund has grown from.

2637. But has the capital of the fund been augmented since 1815 by fresh subscriptions and contributions?—No, not at all, except that there was one subscription of 100*l.* in the Russian War. At that time the Lloyd's Patriotic Fund had it in contemplation to raise a large sum, but just then the Royal Commission came out and we did not wish to clash with them, so we simply dropped the matter.

2638. Then you regard your fund as available for permanent benefits; has it ever been considered expedient to hand over its administration to the Patriotic Fund Commissioners?—No, I think there would be the strongest opposition to that at Lloyd's; the Patriotic Fund Commissioners are not in very good odour there.

2639. You consider that you are able to administer the funds better for the purposes for which they were subscribed than would be the case if they were confided to the Patriotic Fund Commissioners?—That is the feeling of the trustees, and it is the feeling at Lloyd's, I think, and in the City generally.

2640. But those who are claimants upon your fund in very many cases are entitled to assistance from some of the funds administered by the

Chairman—continued.

Patriotic Fund Commissioners, are they not?—I do not remember any instance, I think it is possible that it might be so in some instances; but I cannot remember any instance.

2641. Do you apprehend any danger of the duplicating of relief given by your fund, by the recipients claiming from others also?—We make very careful inquiries, and we know exactly what these poor people have. If we thought they were getting sufficient from another fund, that would be quite enough; we should not give them anything.

2642. What method do you pursue in obtaining that information. Do you put yourself in communication with the Patriotic Fund Commissioners?—We inquire very carefully what their actual means are and where they come from, and they must furnish us with the names of some persons who know what their means are.

2643. Would it not be a more direct way to send their names round, and ask if they had been inquired into by the Patriotic Fund Commissioners?—Yes; but I think it would be a very rare circumstance that anyone who was entitled to relief from the Royal Patriotic Fund would come to us. They deal only with a certain class of widows and orphans. Certain hard cases have come to us (we consider that we are the safety-valve of all the funds) which we consider ought to have been dealt with by the Royal Patriotic Fund Commissioners, but we would not let them pass, because they would not help them, and we have helped them. There is a case which came within a month that I might mention. It was the widow of a very good soldier who had served 21 years, and been in the Crimea, and had borne a good character; after his discharge on a pension he died and left a widow, who is now over 70. This widow was one of the few women who had been chosen by the Government to go to the Crimea, and she helped the soldiers through the whole of that campaign. She nursed and washed. Although this man's death could not be directly traced to disease contracted in the Crimea, still there is no doubt that that campaign shortened his life, and there was a medical certificate that he did suffer from bronchitis and rheumatism; but I suppose the Patriotic Fund Commissioners thought he was an unconscionable while dying, and they would not help the widow, so we did.

2644. The Patriotic Fund is available only for the widows of those who have lost their lives in the Russian War, or have died of wounds received in that particular war?—Yes; but there was a very strong feeling at Lloyd's that an exception ought to have been made in a case of that kind where the woman actually went through the campaign, and helped the Army.

2645. But such a person would be entitled to assistance from the Soldiers' Effects Fund, or one of the other funds administered by the Patriotic Fund Commissioners, would she not?—She does not appear to have had anything from any such source.

2646. Your case is that there do come under your notice as worthy of assistance some who have made application to the Patriotic Fund Commissioners, but who, although meritorious in your opinion, have not been thought entitled to assistance from them?—That is only one instance; there have been others.

2647. I should like to ask you this: In the event of a case of that kind occurring which, in your judgment, was entitled to assistance by the Patriotic Fund Commissioners, do you not think it would be a wise thing before coming to a determination to apply to the Patriotic Fund Commissioners, and ask on what ground it had been refused by them?—Although I did not personally ask the Patriotic Fund Commissioners, I asked the officer who applied to the Patriotic Fund Commissioners, and he showed me a letter of the secretary of the Patriotic Fund, from which it appeared that she could not be assisted because her husband's death could not be directly traced to service in the Crimea.

2648. Then you maintain that without derogating from the work done by the Patriotic Fund Commissioners there still remain a number of claimants whose cases you are competent to deal with, and which are certainly meritorious?—Yes; the principle of the trustees of the Lloyd's Patriotic Fund is not to let a hard case go past if they can help it. Of course, regulations are good things, but after all the people ought to be considered more than the regulations; and we have very large powers under our scheme, and in exceptional cases we use them exceptionally, as we did in this case.

2649. How frequently is your committee of management called together?—They must, by the scheme, be called together at least once a quarter.

2650. Are applications heard and considered by them, or are they dealt with by you?—I am in daily communication with the trustees; they are at Lloyd's within two minutes of my office, and if there is a case which seems to require immediate attention it can be dealt with at once. If not, it would remain to the next meeting.

2651. Are your accounts prepared annually?—Yes

2652. Are they audited?—Yes; audited by two of the trustees. This year they are audited by two trustees and the chairman; generally they are audited by two trustees.

2653. The scheme does not require that the accounts should be submitted to any Government Department?—No, but they are furnished to the Charity Commissioners; a copy is sent to them.

2654. The honourable Chairman asked you what steps you took for the religious education of children. Did I understand you correctly to say that the question was not considered at all?—No, we have never had the question raised, so far as I remember. We always trust to the institution that we send the children to, to give them efficient religious education.

2655. But you never remember a single case of the religion of any particular child having to be specially considered?—I think I remember the case of the daughter of an Irish seaman or an Irish soldier getting a nomination to the Orphan Asylum at Devonport, and the mother refused it because she thought the child might be converted. That was some years ago.

2656. That was the only case you remember?—That was the only case I remember. The parents, as a rule, do not seem to make any inquiries on that account. The mother declined the nomination; at any rate, she did not send the child to the asylum.

2657. On religious grounds?—Yes.

2658. But you took no steps?—There was nothing we could do; we are not connected with any special Roman Catholic asylum.

Chairman.

2659. Is it not the fact, that ignoring the faith of the parents leads to having all the children brought up in the tenets of the Established Church?—That has never been considered; I suppose it would be so practically in some schools.

2660. As a matter of fact, you have not given any attention to the subject in the way of taking pains to see that the wishes of the parents are respected in regard to the religious education given to the children?—The wishes of the parents have never been expressed except in that one instance which I have mentioned.

2661. It is assumed they have no objection to the form of religious instruction given in the schools to which you send the children?—Yes.

2662. And those schools are in the main taught according to the Established Church?—Yes, I suppose they are. I think we must have sent Roman Catholic children there because we have sent the children of Irish soldiers and seamen there, who no doubt were Roman Catholics.

Mr. Kearley.

2663. Although you have been secretary to Lloyd's Patriotic Fund for many years you have maintained, or endeavoured to maintain, all the way through your administration a system of extreme liberality, I understand?—I think so.

2664. And you would never allow a hard case to go by?—That has been the idea of the trustees, that they would not let a hard case go by because it did not come quite four square within certain regulations; otherwise we could have done nothing except for men disabled by wounds received in action, and relatives of those killed in action; and practically we do assist a great many others.

2665. That would have been very handicapping to you?—Yes.

2666. But, owing to the elasticity of your powers, you have been able to make concessions from time to time which have enabled you to deal with necessitous cases?—Yes, we have been able on some occasions to help the Government, if I may say so, by giving a pensioner whose pension they could not increase some assistance, a pensioner whose pension they wanted to increase but could not on account of their own regulations. We have given the Chelsea pensioners some assistance; in fact, cases have been sent to us by the Chelsea Hospital asking us if we could give assistance, because they could not do it themselves.

2667. I was aware that your liberality in connection

nection with the Admiralty; does it extend also to the Army?—Yes.

2668. I know the Admiralty put cases frequently before you, and I understand that they very rarely get refused?—They are generally very good cases if they are sent on like that, and for that reason they would not be refused; but they have to be considered, of course, very circumspectly, because the cash funds are rather short and the applicants are numerous.

2669. But still, generally speaking, I am informed (not officially, of course) by the Admiralty that a good case needs only to be recommended to you to get recognised?—I think that is so; we should be glad, of course, to give more. We are able to give very small sums, but in order to get in all the good cases the assistance has to be small; of course, we cannot give more than we have. We only deal with a certain sum, and although we do not mind exceeding it a little (because the balance at the banker's acts as a kind of buffer, if we exceed it one year, perhaps, we shall be a little under it the next—at least we hope so), still we cannot exceed it very much.

2670. These donations which are annually considered are practically pensions?—They are practically pensions. I have never known a case in which one has been withdrawn, because I have never known a case in which the circumstances have been improved; the circumstances invariably get worse, because the recipient gets older and more infirm. I have never known of one of them coming in for a fortune, for instance. There was one case of the daughter of an officer who was being assisted and who got married; I do not know who married her, but at all events she got married and provided for. She must have had some attractions, I suppose, but she was over 40 and in rather bad health, so she found some philanthropist, I suppose. That is the only case I know of where we have lost one of these annual pensioners.

2671. Do you enforce a system of inquiry into the morals of these annual recipients?—They all have to be well recommended by responsible people, and we lay great stress upon the parish clergy and people who know about them like that; and as a general rule they are people of advanced age and infirmity sufficient to keep them steady.

2672. But let me suppose the case of a woman 65 years of age, living, as I suggest, for sheer companionship, with a man of 70, would you consider that that had an immoral tendency, and would you stop the pension under the circumstances?—Personally, I should not; and I should hope it would not be brought to my notice, because I am afraid, if it were brought before the trustees, it might be stopped. My personal opinion is not worth much, but if it came to the notice of the trustees, I have no doubt the donation would be stopped. There was one case in which the donation was stopped because the recipient turned out a thief. She had some help; seemed to be a woman who was trying to get her living, and we had very good authority to that effect; in fact, she was trying to get her living, and was at one time in a half-starving condition. She had 10*l.* a year for several years; then she was given some employment by a Mrs. Ellis Williams, who runs the Royal Military Benevolent Fund; she stole some bank-notes which were on the table, and she is suffering now a term of imprisonment. Of course, that case is one that will never come back to us, and if it did, I do not think the trustees would assist it, because it would be a bad example. However, that is the only case that I remember of one of the recipients having gone to the bad. It might have been the effect of sudden temptation, I cannot say, and the woman is suffering for that now. She was the daughter of a good officer.

2673. Are the recommendations that you receive from the local clergy of such a nature in the main that they entitle those who come before you to receive these annual benefits?—We do not rely entirely upon the clergy, we try to get people who have known the applicants for a long time, and generally you can find people who have. Very often you find people who have assisted them, and who have got tired of assisting them, because private people cannot of course assist for ever.

2674. Am I correct in understanding that you have between 60 and 70 of these annual recipients and 136 children in schools?—Yes.

2675. That represents the liability on your fund at the present time?—Not altogether, because among that 60 or 70 I have not included disabled soldiers, or disabled seamen, who come and have a gratuity. Latterly, we have not confined it to men disabled by wounds received in action, but we have extended it a little to include men disabled by accidents on duty. For instance, in the Horse Artillery, you find men frequently disabled by falls, a man falls and the gun goes over him. We consider that although he was not injured in action, it is the next thing to it; and, so long as the fund will enable us, we shall assist such cases.

2676. You value your capital at the present price of your investments?—Yes, at the present price I consider we have about 85,000*l.*; but I should think our presentations to schools must have a much larger value. We gave 60,000*l.* to the Royal Naval Asylum in 1806 for the privilege, and that privilege, if we chose to use it to the utmost, would be worth very much more. Then we have presentations to the Royal School for the Daughters of Officers, which are worth 10,000 guineas. We have presentations to the Eltham College, which was the Royal Naval School, which would be worth at the present price of money about 20,000*l.*; we have 12 presentations worth 50*l.* each annually. Then, we have presentations to a School for the Daughters of Officers of the Navy and Marines; we have only two there, but that is 4,000*l.* So that I think I am quite within the mark in saying that our presentations are worth 100,000*l.*

2677. I notice that you have been exceeding your income for the last two or three years?—Yes.

2678. Is it the principle of Lloyd's Patriotic Fund to expend its income. Has it never been the practice to accumulate funds?—No, we do not want to accumulate income. We should like like to have more money, because we could buy more presentations, but we do not appeal to the public; there are so many applications to the public for various things. I daresay if there were another war, and we were obliged to divert the money to a number of men disabled in action, we should make another appeal to the public to keep up the payments to these hard cases which we have taken in hand.

2679. You contemplated doing that in 1854?—Yes; but the others stepped in.

2680. Would not that prevent your making an appeal in another period, that you had that hesitation at the time of that war?—No; I think we should be a little quicker another time.

Chairman.

2681. Are you aware that Parliament passed the Patriotic Fund Act, 1886, and placed upon the Commissioners of the Patriotic Fund the responsibility from time to time to ask for and receive contributions from the public for these purposes?—No; if I knew it I had forgotten it.

2682. The inference being that Parliament in its wisdom thought that these appeals ought not to be made except under special authority; that there is a general inference of that kind, I do not say shared by the Committee?—I think the feeling among our trustees is that the Patriotic Fund of 1854 ought to have been our Patriotic Fund. We ought to have been first in the field, but we did not wish to clash with the fund which had already caught on, and so we simply abstained, and we took objects that this other fund did not, because the Crimean Fund simply took widows and orphans, and gave nothing to soldiers disabled in action nor to other relatives.

Mr. Kearley.

2683. But you would not be governed in any way by the fact that Parliament gave the Patriotic Fund Commissioners power to apply to the public, in the event of future wars, for subscriptions?—We should take no notice of that at all; the Government is nothing to us particularly.

2684. As a matter of fact, in the event of a future war it would be your proposal to make that appeal?—That is the present intention of the trustees, I believe.

2685. And I presume you would anticipate a very large response?—I think the public would respond liberally in the event of war.

Lord Edmund Talbot.

2686. But you have not made an appeal since the Crimean war?—No.

Mr. Kearley.

2687. When your funds were collected in 1803 you really applied the whole of the funds for the benefit of those for whom they were subscribed?—Yes, we applied actually more than the fund that was raised.

2688. And I understand you to say that this fund which you have in hand now arises from your good bargain in purchasing long annuities at a very low price?—Yes, chiefly.

2689. Did you capitalise those annuities?—We invested the proceeds that were not used, and our investments have paid us extremely well, because we have always invested in consols until lately. We have changed consols within the last five or six years (part of them) to railway debentures and preference shares; but the consols paid us well, because we bought them cheap in past times, and their tendency has always been to rise. That is why we are in a better position than we should have been.

2690. Supposing you were to collect a future fund at the time of some war for a particular purpose to benefit the widows, orphans, and dependent relatives of those who fell in the war?——And the men themselves who were disabled; we should never forget them.

2691. Would you feel it your duty, having made a direct appeal to the public for that particular purpose, to allocate those funds to those people in their entirety?—I think so. That was done in the first instance. When the fund was collected in the early part of the century there was no idea of keeping a vested fund and applying the proceeds; the whole of the money was paid away; in fact, they paid more than they got. It is pure accident that the fund is in existence; but being in existence, it is considered that it is best to keep it in existence and apply it to things that turn up. We find that we do a great deal of good in various cases that other funds do not seem to apply to.

2692. You said that the Patriotic Fund Commission was in bad odour, I think?—It is not in good odour in the City.

2693. Have you followed its administration at all?—I remember that some years ago there were two gentlemen, called honorary secretaries, and it turned out that they were receiving 700*l.* a year apiece. That was rather a shocker in the City, because it was always supposed that honorary people received nothing.

2694. That was the impression?—Yes.

2695. That was the rumour, the statement?—Yes.

2696. I suppose it is generally known by report of the Patriotic Fund that there has been, and continues to be, a large accumulation of funds in the hands of the Patriotic Fund Commissioners?—Yes.

2697. And that some of the funds are not being administered at all, they are simply accumulating, and the income is not being spent at all; is that a matter of notoriety?—I am not sure that it is.

2698. But sufficient is known, at all events, to make the Patriotic Fund Commission in bad odour with people in the City?—There is a sort of impression that the right people do not always get the money that they ought to have; and that has been strengthened by such cases as the one I mentioned as occurring just lately, and one or two others.

2699. What was the name of that person you relieved?—She was a Mrs. Darcy, the widow of a soldier who had served 21 years, I forget in what regiment, through the whole of the Crimean campaign, and the medical certificate said that his constitution was injured by disease contracted in the Crimea.

2700. Do you relieve the old soldier when he is in necessitous circumstances?—They are exceptional cases. If it is a hard case we do. It was not contemplated when the fund was raised to do so, but it has been done in some instances. Some cases have been sent on by the Commissioners of Chelsea themselves where they could do nothing.

to

2701. Is it the practice of Lloyd's Patriotic Fund to pension its employés?—I am the only person who is employed there, and I have been there for 36 years, and my predecessor died in the service; he died when I was assistant secretary, so there was no opportunity to pension him; and he had been at the fund since 1815.

2702. You have no assistant secretary?—No.

2703. Can you tell us the expenses of the management of your fund?—The expense last year was 528*l.*, so far as I can remember; anyhow, it was under 530*l.*; it is about the same each year. If you look on the reverse side of the balance-sheet I think you will see the expenditure in detail.

Chairman.

2704. Can you tell the Committee what percentage the cost of administering the fund bears to the payments made?—Yes; but then the payments form such a small part of the action of our fund. The school presentations form the greatest part of the fund business.

Mr. Kearley.

2705. You say it is 500*l.*?—Yes, it is set out in detail. The expenses are 536*l.* It would be difficult to say what our capital actually is, what the value of it is; because it would be difficult to capitalise the value of our presentations to Greenwich Hospital School if we were to use them to the utmost.

Mr. Kearley—continued.

Chairman.

2706. The actual cost of administration stands at something like 25 per cent. of the amount of annual income, but those figures are somewhat illusory, because a large part of the benefits conferred upon the applicants is in the form of 136 presentations to schools, which have already been paid for out of the capital of the fund?—That is so.

Mr. Kearley.

2707. And this sum of 536*l.* represents the total annual expenditure in relation to a fund valued at 85,000*l.*?—Yes.

2708. In addition to which there is a considerable amount of work involved in connection with the presentations purchased from time to time by the fund, and which you value at 100,000*l.*?—Yes, they are worth at least 100,000*l.*, they are really worth more, if we were to use the Greenwich Hospital School to the extent that we are entitled to.

Lord Edmund Talbot.

2709. You mean that you do not send as many there as you might?—No, we use discretion in that respect.

2710. Why do not you?—It might have the effect of keeping out other good cases. The school is full to its capacity; and if we put in one child it would displace another. Still, we never let good cases go.

(No. 2732—93.)

Royal Commission of the Patriotic Fund,
53, Charing Cross, S.W., 27 October 1893.

Sir,

NUMEROUS applications are being received for assistance for the Widows and Orphans of deceased Seamen and Marines other than those who lost their lives in June last by the sinking of H.M.S. "Victoria."

Some of the cases appear to have received assistance from Greenwich Hospital Fund, while others appear to have received no assistance from Naval sources.

As the fund at the disposal of this Commission applicable to either class of these cases is very limited in extent, I am directed to ask that, if compliance with the following request will not give too much trouble, I may be furnished with a list of such cases as have been relieved from Naval sources since the issue of the regulations, dated 21st December 1883, "for the grant of pensions to widows, and allowances to children, and of gratuities to parents and other relatives of Seamen, Marines, and other seafaring persons"; also a list of such cases of Seamen and Marines who died while actually employed, but whose widows, orphans, or other dependent relatives have received no assistance.

I have, &c.

WITH reference to your letter of 27th October, asking for a list of cases relieved from Naval sources since the issue of the regulations of 21st December 1883, I am commanded by my Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty to transmit herewith :—

1. A list of the number of widows and orphans assisted from Greenwich Hospital Funds.

2. Total number of gratuities to parents and other relatives of Seamen and Marines.

It is found that there are no means in office of identifying the cases of those widows or other dependent relatives who have been refused assistance since 1883.

I am, &c.

APPENDIX, No. 4.

PAPER handed in by Colonel J. S. Young, 14 June 1895.

Dear Sir, Sailors' Rest, Portsmouth, 7 August 1893.

It is understood that the Patriotic Fund will, in conjunction with certain representatives from the Navy, administer the various sums collected at the Mansion House and from other sources in aid of the relatives and friends of those lost in the "Victoria"; and, in view of a possible early distribution of the same, will you kindly inform me for Miss Weston, who has, as perhaps you are aware, been distributing for the last six weeks, not only to the widows and others living here, but all over the kingdom, when it is proposed to commence the relief in question, in order that she may be able to cease her weekly relief, as otherwise there would be a double distribution.

She has a very comprehensive account, not only of the circumstances of each recipient, numbering, probably, three-fourths or more of the whole, but of the various sums given each from time to time, and would, no doubt, be very pleased to assist the Fund in certifying to any application which you will probably require each candidate to fill in.

I am, &c.

Fleet Paymaster, R.N.

(2021.)

Dear Sir, Royal Commission of the Patriotic Fund, 53, Charing Cross, S.W., 11 August 1893.

Your letter of 7th instant having been addressed to 5, St. Martin's-place, did not reach me in due course.

In reply, I may say that information had already reached this Commission that relief has been, and is continuing to be, afforded from various sources to the widows, children, and other dependents of those who perished in H.M.S. "Victoria."

It is, as you say, of course desirable to avoid double distribution of relief, and this can only be effectually accomplished by full information as possible being afforded to this Commission of the sums already disbursed to a given date to each widow for herself, and where there are children, for each child, and in cases of other dependents, to each individual dependent; also the total amount, at same given date, in hand from sums subscribed for distribution in relief of the "Victoria" widows, orphans, and other dependents.

If you can kindly give any information in regard to the relief afforded and the balance in hand at a given date of the sums sent to Miss Weston for the "Victoria" widows, orphans, and other dependents, together with any such additional information, as you mention in your letter you have in a very comprehensive state, as to the circumstances of each recipient, the same will be gratefully received.

Thanking you for courtesy in the matter,

John W. Seccombe, Esq., R.N., Fleet Paymaster, Sailors' Rest, Portsmouth.

I am, &c.
(signed) J. S. Young, Secretary.

Dear Colonel Young, Royal Sailors' Rest, Devonport, 21 August 1893.

I should be very glad to have a personal interview with you, either in London or here, as most convenient to yourself. I am pensioning a large number of widows and mothers all over the United Kingdom, and these cases do not in any way come within the jurisdiction of the local committee here.

In order to prevent overlapping, and to place a large amount of accredited information before you, which will be valuable to the Commission, we ought to meet.

I am, &c.

(2113.)

Dear Miss Weston, Royal Commission of the Patriotic Fund, 53, Charing Cross, S.W., 23 August 1893.

I should be very pleased to make your acquaintance personally, and would name a time and place for meeting you, but that I am quite unable to do so at present, owing to the exceptional calls upon my time, which I am afraid will last yet awhile.

If, however, you will be so kind as to let me have, meanwhile, in a written form, in reply to my letter to you of 11th instant, the information you kindly offered to place at the disposal of this Commission and that asked for in my letter, the object you mention as having in view in both of your letters to me of 7th and 21st instant, viz., to prevent overlapping of relief to the dependents of those who perished in H.M.S. "Victoria," will best be effected.

Miss Weston, Royal Sailors' Rest, Devonport.

I am, &c.

Second Annual Report and Balance Sheet.

For the Year ending 31st December 1894.

9, Craig's-court, Charing Cross, London, S.W.,
1 February 1895.

Sir,

In presenting to your Royal Highness the Second Annual Report and Balance Sheet of the Royal Naval Fund, the committee beg to make the following remarks with regard to the distribution of the year's income.

The total number of cases which were relieved was 53. This number shows a considerable increase on that of last year and proves that the fund is becoming more widely known.

The committee have continued the distribution of the fund on the same lines as in the previous year, not in the form of pension, but by giving gratutities, which are paid either in a lump sum or by instalments as is best suited to the necessities of each case.

Temporary grants are made in urgent cases pending the investigation which precedes the final award.

The committee are much indebted to the ladies' committees at the various Naval Ports for the trouble they have taken in investigating the cases for relief, and also for the care they have taken in administering the funds entrusted to them for distribution.

The committee again acknowledge their indebtedness to the clergy of all denominations, and to many Naval and Marine officers and others interested in the working of the fund, who have rendered valuable services.

The trust investments remain as reported last year, but it may be satisfactory to note that their present value is nearly 4,000*l.* more than appears in the account.

Although the balance sheet shows a substantial surplus, it must be borne in mind that with the increase of the personnel of the Navy there will be a corresponding demand on the fund, the yearly income of which has not materially improved.

I have, &c.

Chairman of Committee.

IMPERIAL WAR FUND.

Précis of Trust Deed.

INDENTURE made the 7th May 1884, between the Right Hon. Francis, Earl of Wemyss and March, one of Her Majesty's Aides de Camp; the Right Hon. Garnet Joseph, Lord Wolseley, a General in Her Majesty's Army, G.C.B., Adjutant General to the Forces; Sir Richard Chambre Hayes Taylor, a General in Her Majesty's Army, K.C.B., Governor of the Royal Military College, Sandhurst; and others, trustees of the first part; and Colonel Henry Hardinge Denne Stracey, Scots Guards, of the other part, recites (1) that in 1882 the Egyptian War caused great hardships and sufferings to the wives and families of men engaged; (2) particularly to the wives and families of men married without leave, and who died in the war or from disease, or who were afterwards discharged from the Army on account of disease; therefore Lady Jane Taylor started the Egyptian War Fund, which fund has hitherto been administered by a committee of about 84 persons. A balance sheet being prepared and audited showing over 3,000*l.* in the hands of Messrs. Cox, it was resolved, on the 27th March 1884, that the fund should be available also for families of men engaged in future wars, and a trust created for the surplus moneys. This was approved, and a resolution on 27th March 1884, ordering Messrs. Cox to pay over to the trustees 3,189*l.* 14*s.* 6*d.*, the balance of the fund, and with Colonel Stracey joined in the execution hereof, was carried into effect.

1. The trust fund and interest to be applied for the relief of wives and families or female relatives of men killed in the war, or dying of disease, or invalided in consequence of wounds or disease contracted during the war, and for the relief of men invalided for wounds and disease, either by grant, pension, or periodical allowance, at the discretion of the trustees.

2. Any surplus may be applied to relief of families or men suffering in future campaigns.

3. Trustees empowered to administer the fund in their absolute discretion.

4. Any one or more trustees can call a meeting by letter giving seven days notice. At any meeting two trustees shall form a quorum. The chairman to have a casting vote.

5. The trustees are empowered to employ a secretary, &c., and pay salaries, &c., out of funds.

6. Trustees may apply to the public for further subscriptions, which shall be treated as part of the trust fund.

7. The trustees may invest money in home and foreign securities, and shall not be liable should any loss result.

8. The Adjutant General for the time being to be ex-officio trustee.

9. A retiring or incapacitated trustee may appoint a successor. Failing this, after twelve months, the Commander in Chief, and the Secretary of State for War, may appoint any person they think fit in their discretion, such appointment to be advertised in the "London Gazette" and one daily, and one Service paper. The trustees may be increased or diminished, but shall never be less than three, including the Adjutant General.

10. Proper transfers of the trust fund to be made on the appointment of fresh trustee, but no change in names as regards investments.

11. The trustees may, in special meeting, alter the objects and administration and distribution of the trust funds, and also alter the provisions of this indenture, a supplementary deed to be made accordingly.

FUND FOR THE RELIEF OF THE SUFFERERS BY THE MUTINY IN INDIA.

Allowance to Widows.

1. THE allowance to a widow cannot be transferred.

2. In case of immoral conduct it will cease.

3. It will cease, also, on her marrying again, but she may apply again in case of a second widowhood. If, however, the Committee approve of the second marriage, they will in such cases continue to the woman a portion of the allowance granted to her as the widow of a soldier, sailor, or marine, who lost his life on service connected with the Mutiny. But if a widow marry again and conceal such marriage from the Committee, and after such re-marriage receive any allowance from the Fund as if she were still a widow and unmarried, by which she renders herself liable to be prosecuted, she will be wholly struck off from the Fund, and never again restored to it.

4. If, capable of service, she remains idle, and will not go to service or assist to maintain herself, she will be struck off the books. It is not intended that widows shall live in idleness on the Fund.

5. Every encouragement will be given to widows, either with or without children, who go to service or work at home. Their children, if they desire it, will be placed in asylums as far as may be practicable.

6. A widow in service without a child, or whose child or children are provided for out of the Fund, will be allowed a gratuity of four guineas or six guineas, according to merit, by quarterly payments in every year, on the receipt at this office of a certificate from her master or mistress.

7. Where a widow with a child or children is in service, and maintains her child or children herself, she will not have any gratuity, but the same allowance which was made to her whilst out of service will still be continued in order that whilst in service she may supply, as it were, another mother for her children.

8. A widow leaving service properly will have the former allowance out of the Fund again paid whilst out of service.

Going to service, therefore, must improve, and can in no case damage the widow's comforts and prospects.

All allowances will, as far as possible, commence on the first of a month, and in order to save time in making the payments, and to dispense with pence and fractions in calculations, the first and second months in each quarter are to be computed at four weeks each, and the last month in each quarter as consisting of five weeks.

Constant consideration given by the Commissioners to the question of relief from the accumulated surpluses; temporary character of these owing to the fluctuation of the investments in colonial and other securities, Young 1082–1084——Explanation that the Commissioners act through the Executive and Finance Committee, who meet regularly once a month, and sometimes much oftener, nearly all the members being in attendance; return hereon, Young 1199. 1201–1218; App. 194–197——Care taken to treat each fund as a separate estate, Young 1244, 1245.

Very rare instances of reference of cases to the Patriotic Fund Commissioners; that is, where there is any probability of their being able to grant relief, 1276–1284—— Selection of forty-three specimen cases which have recently been sent to the Commissioners in order to ascertain whether they could have granted relief if the applications had gone before them in the first instance; the result of this inquiry shall be laid before the Committee, 1273–1275. 1307, 1308.

Cost of Administration. Examination as to the charge levied by the Patriotic Fund Commissioners for administration; practice to charge 4 per cent on the income of any fund except in the case of small funds, such as the "Atalanta," on which no charge whatever is made, Young 421–427. 449–466.

Estimate that additional funds could be managed by Greenwich Hospital at a cost of 2 per cent, Lambert 1791–1793.

D.

FitzGerald* 1605–1613——Inquiry by the Civil Department of the Admiralty in cases of gratuities to dependent relatives, other than widows, Lambert 1861–1864.

Examination in regard to the relief afforded to orphans other than those from the Russian War, who, by the Act of 1867, were brought within the jurisdiction of the fund; such relief has been limited to the placing of orphans in the Royal Victoria Patriotic Asylum, 796–817——Question raised as to the reason why no action was taken by the Commissioners until 1891 to deal with a surplus which had been steadily increasing since 1882; explanation of the opinion of the Commissioners on this subject, 818–841.

Attention called to the largely increasing assets of the "Soldiers' Effects" Fund; the cases for relief are transferred from the War Office, and the balance of the fund is kept in hand to meet any extraordinary demand, 842–858——Consideration of the charge for management of the "Soldiers' Effects" Fund, 859–866.

Further examination in regard to the difficulties experienced by the Commissioners in the administration of the "Rodriguez" Fund owing to the necessity for recipients to be "indigent and necessitous," 867–897——Evidence showing that the "Rodriguez" Fund was at one time advertised, 898–905.

[Fourth Examination.]—Further statement in explanation of the non-extension of relief out of the "Soldiers' Effects Fund" to women and children coming under Clause "C," the Commissioners having been officially informed that the balance of the fund, after providing for all cases of death by war service, should be retained, 906–911—— Very few cases for which the "Thurlow" Fund is considered to be applicable, it being applied

Explanations with further reference to the allowances out of the "Atalanta" Fund to officers' widows and to the widows of petty officers and of ordinary seamen, respectively, witness stating that the rules were laid down by the Committee who raised the fund, and not by the Commissioners, 931–946—— Reduction of capital in the case not only of the "Atalanta" Fund, but of the "Captain" Fund, 947–950 —— Expenditure in excess of the income of the "Atalanta" Fund; obstacle to increasing the allowances under this Fund out of the "Victoria" or the Royal Naval Relief Fund, 951–956.

Examination in detail with further reference to the action of the Commissioners in the matter of allowances out of the Zulu War Fund; grounds for justifying the non-increase of allowances between 1883 and 1892, though there was a considerable surplus income which has been gradually increasing since 1886; 958–1020.

Explanation in the case of the Royal Naval Relief Fund that there were no available funds until 1878; 1048–1052——Reference to the Royal Commission of 1875 as having authorised the Patriotic Fund Commissioners to receive contributions towards the Royal Naval Relief Fund, it being left to the Commissioners to defer the grant of relief till there was a sufficient accumulation of funds, 1053–1057. 1069–1073. 1088, 1089—— Relief granted out of this fund to a so-called "officer," who is really a gunner or carpenter, 1058–1068.

Statement as to the Commissioners having specifically declined to be the medium for collecting subscriptions for any of the funds: application made, however, to the Admiralty in respect of the Royal Naval Reserve Fund, 1074–1081. 1085–1087——Constant consideration given by the Commissioners to the question of relief from the accumulated surpluses; temporary character of these owing to the fluctuation of the investments in colonial and other securities, 1082–1084.

Instance of considerable fluctuation in the capital value of the colonial securities, 1083——Considerable percentage borne by the cost of management to the expenditure in the case of the Royal Naval Reserve Fund, 1090–1093.

Contention as regards the Government inquiry of 1881 that the question of dissolving the Patriotic Fund Commission was abandoned because of the unpracticability of the proposal, 1094–1111——Admission as to there having been too much generosity in the management of the boys' school, 1112–1115——Exception taken to a statement as to it having been proposed to establish a sanitary establishment at Margate, 1116.

Explanatory statement as to the conditions and principles upon which the "Victoria" Relief Fund has been administered; recognition of the principle, as adopted by the Mansion House Committee, that the distribution should be graded according to rank and wages, 1117–1135. 1191–1196——Obligation upon the Commissioners under the Act of 1881 as to the mode of application of surpluses, so that they were debarred from handing over to the Admiralty any surplus from the "Victoria" Fund, as proposed by Lord Spencer, 1136–1138.

Positive denial that there was any undue delay on the part of the Commissioners in administering the "Victoria" Fund; explanations hereon in connection with the relief distributed by a committee at Portsmouth, acting in conjunction with Miss Weston, 1140–1147 ——Examination upon a letter written by the Commissioners to Mrs. Mary Tiltman, on 13th January 1894, in which she is informed that she will receive an allowance of 5*s.* per week in respect of her son, lost in the "Victoria," but that as she has already received a gratuity from the Admiralty the allowance will not commence till 1st July 1895; 1148–1156. 1188, 1189——Explanation as to the allowances from the fund having been made at an earlier date than was at first intended, 1155, 1156——

Further Parliamentary powers necessary in order that the scope and usefulness of the several funds may be widened; wider powers required more especially as regards widows, 1178-1184——Extension of educational assistance by means of the Rodriguez Fund, the Commissioners having full power to apply this fund in the same way as the Patriotic Fund, 1185-1187.

Meeting of the Commissioners only once a year, except when there is a new fund to be administered, when they meet as often as the requirements of the case indicate, 1197-1200——Explanation that the Commissioners act through the Executive and Finance Committee, who meet regularly once a month and sometimes much oftener, nearly all the members being in attendance; Return to be furnished hereon, 1199. 1201-1218—— Constitution and functions of the committee of management of the Royal Patriotic Asylum, 1219.

Information respecting the finance sub-committee and its constitution; part taken by this committee in connection with the accounts and with finance and investments, transfer of stock, &c., 1220-1227——Explanation as to Mr. Lidderdale (ex-Governor of the Bank of England), being entrusted by the Commissioners with all large investments or re-investments, such as the transfer of colonial securities into home securities, 1222. 1249-1256. 1260, 1261.

Obligation upon the Commissioners in their award of allowances to be guided by the provisions of the trust deed of each fund, and to inquire into the circumstances of the recipients, 1229-1234——Statement on the subject of there being no Wesleyan children at the Royal Victoria Patriotic Asylum, 1235-1240.

Explanations respecting certain book transfers of stock from other funds to the "Captain" Relief Fund, this being done to save the expense of sale and re-investment, 1241-1247——Care taken to treat each fund as a separate estate, 1244, 1245——Investments made at the inception of each fund; belief that as regards colonial securities the Commissioners were advised by Lord Addington, 1248. 1257-1259——Explanations in justification of the appointment of Mr. Lidderdale as adviser in respect of investments, 1249-1256. 1260, 1261——Excellent security for some Manchester Ship Canal Debentures purchased on the advice of Mr. Lidderdale, 1255-1256.

Explanation that the valuation of all the funds and securities rests exclusively with Mr. Finlaison, as actuary, neither the Commissioners nor witness having anything to do with the matter, 1262-1266.

[Fifth Examination.]—Statement showing that the attendance of many of the Commissioners at the Board meetings and at Committee meetings has been very good, and that the Commissioners generally take a continuous and active interest in the administration of the Fund, 1309-1317——Excellent attendances given by the Prince of Wales, 1314——Total of twelve meetings in five years, 1314. 1427.

Reference to the "Captain," the "Eurydice," the "Atalanta," and certain other Funds as not liable to have any fresh claims or annuitants upon them, this not applying to the Patriotic Fund and others, 1318, 1319——Admission as to the receipts from the "Captain" and some other terminable funds in 1894 having been in excess of the expenditure, 1320-1325——Policy of the Commissioners in dealing with each fund to be guarded first by the conditions of the deed of trust; and, secondly, by the provisions laid down by the Legislature in connection with the Patriotic Fund, with regard to any surplus that may arise, 1325-1332.

Further explanations respecting the Rodriguez Fund and its administration, witness justifying the action of the Commissioners under which the capital is now about double the original bequest, the surplus having been made applicable since 1867 to the same purposes as the Patriotic Fund, 1333-1354. 1543——Grounds for defending the limited distribution out of the Rodriguez Fund as compared with the receipts; steps taken for ascertaining whether there were not more beneficiaries entitled to claim under the terms of the original bequest, 1335-1354. 1543——Conclusion that the Rodriguez Fund was well known to the War Office authorities, 1346.

Consideration of the question of communication between the War Office and the Patriotic Fund Commissioners when applications for relief are received by the former; entire concurrence in the view that continuous intercommunication is most desirable, 1346-1350——Considerable time required for the investigation of forty-three cases sent on by the War Office to the Commissioners; belief, however, that in thirteen of these cases cases application had already been made to the Commissioners, 1355, 1356——Inquiry completed in two cases, in one of which the applicant has since died, whilst in the other no claim was established, 1356.

Absence of any unnecessary delay on the part of the Commissioners in presenting their provisional scheme for the "Victoria" Fund, 1357–1359——Explanations with further reference to the funds allocated under the Act of 1867 to the maintenance and education of children, money grants not being given to Roman Catholic children whilst waiting for admission to the orphanages, 1360–1372.

Reduction of the surplus assets in 1891 by about 65,000*l.* through the restoration of re-married women to full allowances, 1368. 1373——Larger number of children waiting for admission to the Roman Catholic orphanages than to the Royal Victoria Patriotic Asylum; particulars hereon, 1369–1382. 1508–1510. 1524.

Information respecting the case of a widow named Boots, whose husband died in the Crimea after more than two years' service there, she having been refused an allowance from the Patriotic Fund on the ground of immoral character, 1383–1397——Exclusion of widows from pensions in the event of immorality, irrespectively of age or grade; the information coming frequently from local sources, 1387–1390. 1419–1426——Condition in the case of some of the funds that a woman ceases to have a claim if she remains idle, 1398, 1399.

Particulars relative to the case of the widow of a man named Thomas Harter, who served in the Navy before Sebastopol, she having been refused an allowance from the Patriotic Fund, though her two sons were admitted to the school; conclusion that the death of Harter was not due to service in the Russian War, 1400–1409——Definition of the term "indigent and necessitous" in connection with the application of the Rodriguez Fund, this fund being, however, now lumped with the Patriotic Fund, 1410–1418. 1465–1467. 1543.

Conditions laid down in the trust deeds of the funds by the committee that raised each fund, the Commissioners being guided thereby as regards surpluses, &c., 1428–1431——Explanatory statement on the subject of the receipt of parochial relief not being a disqualification for relief from the Balaclava Fund, though the former must be given up if the latter be granted; reference hereon to the case of Henry Wickham in June 1892; 1432–1444.

Claim only of widows and children to relief from the Patriotic Fund, men wounded in the Russian War having no claim; inadequate fund for the latter purpose, 1445–1452. 1532——Reference to the Balaclava Fund as the only one for the benefit of soldiers, 1453. 1532——Further statement as to the Rodriguez Fund being for the benefit of "men wounded or dying in the wars," and as to the definition thereof by the Commissioners, 1454–1456——Absence of any conditions in connection with the Zervudachi Fund, only one or two widows of soldiers being as yet placed on the fund; denial that the fund is being hoarded, 1457–1459. 1544–1548.

Grounds for the conclusion that the time has not yet arrived for lumping together the surpluses on the several funds, and dealing with the income therefrom as a whole, 1460–1464——Contention that by means of local committees the machinery of the Commission is perfectly competent to deal with applications for immediate relief, 1468–1471——Decided objection to any reduction in the number of the Commissioners, 1472.

Policy of the Commissioners under each fund to adequately relieve the recipients, but without feeling bound to exhaust the fund; claim to have followed the intentions as expressed in the trust deeds, 1473–1476. 1494–1501——Examination in reply to exceptions taken on the ground that there has been inadequate allocation of relief and of expenditure to Roman Catholic children, as compared with Church of England and Protestant children; basis of the allocation, as fixed in 1881, that one-fifth of the total endowment fund should be applied to Roman Catholics, 1477–1488. 1502–1524.

Excess of expenditure in 1894 beyond income in respect of the Royal Victoria Patriotic Asylum, this having been caused by structural alterations and having come out of the endowment fund without any prejudice to the Roman Catholics, 1488. 1504, 1505——Instance of a Scotch Roman Catholic in the home at Girvan, there being no Scotch Presbyterians in any of the homes, 1489–1493.

Further statement as to the Commissioners not having advertised the several funds, the Patriotic Fund being, however, well known at Aldershot, 1525–1527——Denial that the small expenditure of the Soldiers' Effects Fund, as compared with the receipts, is due to the fund not being properly known; due observance by the Commissioners of the policy indicated by the Secretary of State in their administration of the fund, 1528–1531.

Explanation with further reference to the economy in administration by avoiding sale and re-purchase of stock through the system of book transfer as between one stock and another, 1534–1538——Continual communication between the Patriotic Commissioners sioners and the War Office, 1539–1541——Entire inadequacy of the County of Forfar Fund in relation to the number of deserving widows of sailors in Scotland in want of relief, 1550–1554.

Extent and character of the restriction as to relief being given, preferentially, to the widows of soldiers married with leave, 1555, 1556——Nomination of eighteen orphans, sons of officers, to Wellington College, the Commissioners having paid 25,000*l.* to the college; careful selection made, 1557–1563——Entire absence of distinction in the treatment of Baptist as compared with children of other religious persuasions in respect of admission to the Patriotic Asylum, 1564–1567.

Examination as to the grounds upon which witness justifies his claim to a pension as Secretary to the Patriotic Fund Commission, whilst already pensioned as an Army officer, 1568–1578.

Explanation that recipients of relief generally are required to prove that they are unable to support themselves, and are encouraged in the direction of self-maintenance, 1579, 1580——Treatment of the various funds by the Commissioners so that they may be adequate to meet the demands fairly made upon them, 1581——Recognition by Parliament, by the Act of 1881, of the permaneat character of the work of the Commissioners, directions being laid down as regards the accumulation of surpluses, 1582.

Zervudachi Fund. Reference to the Zervudachi Fund and the reasons which led to its being left to accumulate, Young 155–162——Further admission that not a penny of the Zervudachi Fund has been spent, though there are no conditions attached thereto, ib. 928–930.

Absence of any conditions in connection with the Zervudachi Fund, only one or two widows of soldiers being as yet placed on the fund; denial, however, that the fund is being hoarded, Young 1457–1459. 1544–1548——The fund is being administered at present for the benefit of such few cases as may exist of widows of soldiers who died in the wars, in respect of which no public subscription was raised, ib. 1459.

Zulu War Fund. Evidence as to the practice in the event of a widow re-marrying; statement that since 1893, in the event of those who re-married becoming again necessitous widows, they were again re-admitted to the fund, Young 231–241. 246–250——Methods adopted to ensure the protection of the fund from abuse, ib. 241–253——Intention of the Commissioners to increase allowances to widows when attaining the age of sixty, ib. 257–261——Explanation of a certain discrepancy regarding the numbers of widows on the Zulu War Fund, ib. 758.

Examination in detail with further reference to the action of the Commissioners in the matter of allowances out of the Zulu War Fund; grounds for justifying the non-increase of allowances between 1883 and 1892, though there was a considerable surplus income, which has been gradually increasing since 1886; Young 958–1020.

Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL, IN THE CHAIR.

Sir CHARLES HALL, K.C.M.G., Q.C., M.P., Examined.

Chairman.

1. YOU are the Recorder of London ?—Yes.

2. And, as we all know also, you had great experience as one of the leading Counsel in the Admiralty Court for a long time ?—That is so.

3. You have had other experience in regard to nautical matters, and you have had a great deal to do with the fog signals which are now under consideration ?—Yes.

4. I believe the proposed fog signals now under consideration were first definitely put forward by the Washington Conference in 1889 ?—Yes.

5. Were you First British delegate at that conference ?—Yes.

6 And chairman of the British committee, which had afterwards to consider its recommendations ?—Yes.

7. Will you explain to us the steps which led to the adoption of the proposed fog signals by the conference ?—Yes. Before the Conference of Washington met, the fog signals which then existed (the three fog signals in Article 12 of the present Regulations), were introduced practically in their present shape in the schedule to the Merchant Shipping Act, 1862. Perhaps I should state that prior to 1889 (the year in which the Conference of Washington took place), when any alteration was required in the rule of the road at sea it was the practice of this country to submit proposals to the various foreign Governments ; and international agreement on the subject of the proposed alterations was effected by means of diplomatic correspondence. Then, in 1888, the United States proposed that an international conference should be convened to revise the international regulations for preventing collisions at sea, and to secure international agreement on certain other matters also affecting navigation. The correspondence on this subject has been printed in Parliamentary Paper C. 6132. That correspondence shows that one of the chief objects of the United States in summoning the conference was the amendment of the existing fog signals ; so, too, the Act of Congress authorising the conference (which you will find set out there at page 4) states that one of these objects was "to adopt a uniform system of marine signals or other means of plainly indicating the direction in which vessels are moving in fog, mist, falling snow, and thick weather, and at night."

8. That is on page 4 of C. 6132 ?—Yes, that is on page 4 of C. 6132 ; and the despatch in which the invitation to the conference was conveyed to this country stated that the existing regulations "are believed to be" (I am quoting from it now) "inadequate to the present needs of commerce in respect especially to the sound signals for use in fog, mist, or falling snow. The increasing number and speed of steam vessels have greatly added to the dangers of collision in thick weather, and the opinion has recently been expressed by the best authorities that the present system of signals for steam vessels is insufficient."

9. There was, I believe, some preparatory work for the conference done in this country ?—Yes, there was ; a very considerable amount.

10. Will you tell us something about that ?—

Chairman—continued.

In March 1889, six months before the conference met, a circular was sent out from the Board of Trade to shipowners and shipmasters and others in the following terms: "(P.P. C. 6132, page 143, of the book you have before you): "Is it practicable, and, if so, is it advisable, to introduce 'some system of course or route indicating sound-signals to be made by steam-ships under way in fog, mist, or falling snow, when neither can see the other?'" The great majority of the replies were opposed to the introduction of any such system. They will be found also in [C. 6132.]

11. Are the replies found in that volume?—Yes, they are all set out in that book. I propose to give, presently, practically what the consensus of opinion was; and it was mainly, I have no doubt, in consequence of the strong representations which were made in answer to those inquiries that we succeeded at the onset at Washington in carrying a resolution declining to adopt any course indicating signals at all.

12. I think the general summary of replies appears on page 155 of the volume you have referred to?—Yes, that is so.

13. Now, in addition to sending out those questions, a Committee was appointed to consider the existing regulations for preventing collisions at sea with the object of deciding what principles should guide the British delegates at Washington?—I had the honour of being chairman of that Committee My colleagues were Sir Henry Calcraft, the then Secretary to the Board of Trade; Vice Admiral Bowden Smith, who was afterwards appointed Commander in Chief on the Australian Station; Vice Admiral Sir R. H. More Molyneux, who was the Commodore commanding the naval forces in the Red Sea in 1884, and has since served as Superintendent of Sheerness Dockyard and Admiral Superintendent of Devonport Dockyard; Captain Wharton, the Hydrographer to the Admiralty; Mr. Thomas Gray, the then Assistant Secretary of the Marine Department of the Board of Trade, a gentleman who, I believe, had had really more to do with this particular subject of the rule of the road than any man of his time; Sir Digby Murray, Professional Officer of the Board of Trade and formerly Senior Commander of the "White Star" fleet; Vice Admiral Sir George Nares, also a Professional Officer of the Board of Trade, and who is too well known for it to be necessary for me to describe his qualifications; Mr. William Watson, a shipowner, of the City of Dublin Steam Packet Company; and Captain Wyatt, a captain of great experience in the service of the Peninsular and Oriental Company.
